So the motion to reconsider was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill having been ordered to a third reading and read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? upon which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 43, nays 11; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill to amend and supplement an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1906) to dredge and protect the navigable channel at the mouth of the Buffalo River against the sand-bar formed by the gale of December, 1873, was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. FENTON, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 1915) to remove the political disabilities of Henry H. Sibley, a citizen of Fredericksburgh, Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1920) to amend the fifteenth section of an act approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 1921) to further amend the postal code was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

NATIONAL BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will withdraw the motion that I may call up a bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I will.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 432, that it may be left as the unfinished business.

Several SENATORS. What is it?

Mr. SARGENT. I will not antagonize this motion with the naval appropriation bill, but will press for the consideration of that bill after this bill shall have been disposed of, as I understand it will not take much time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from Ohio, being the bill (S. No. 432) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870? The Chair hears none, and that bill is before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. Now I renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nineteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 10, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. H. V. VOORHEES, D. D., of New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CERTIFICATE OF DEPOSIT.

Mr. KNAPP. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that redemption banks, under the national-banking law, have suspended payment to depositors, and issued a large amount of what are known as certified checks of the association of banks, or clearing-house certificates of deposit issued to said banks, and forced them into public circulation; and whereas a thorough understanding of the condition of the national banks is necessary to enable this House to remedy by legislation the financial evils that prostrate trade and destroy public confidence: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested, at the earliest practicable period, to report to this House the amount of such certified checks or clearing-house certificates of deposit issued to said banks in circulation, and what banks are responsible for their redemption; and also be requested to report what banks are still doing business who have suspended payment to their depositors, and what banks are still in suspension.

Mr. DAWES. I think that should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency before it is adopted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object, unless it be referred.

The preamble and resolution were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

GREEN BAY AND LAKE MICHIGAN SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 447) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-canal, in the State of Wisconsin, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, extends the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-canal to the 10th day of April, 1876.

Mr. RANDALL. I object, before any debate occurs.

Mr. BRADLEY. I wish to make a brief statement of the case.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] reserves objection to the introduction of the bill. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not, of course, lose my right to object.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will have to go to the Committee of the Whole, at any rate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman from Michigan making a brief statement.

Mr. BRADLEY. In 1866 Congress passed an act granting two hundred thousand acres of land to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the completion of this canal, which is about one mile and three-quarters in length. The estimated cost is something over $600,000, and the State was to furnish the balance of the means to complete the canal. Congress, in making the grant, reserved to the United States the right to use the canal at all times for its own vessels, or any that it might have in its employ; also, declaring it a public highway, and that after sufficient tolls had been collected to reimburse to the State the moneys expended for its completion, no tolls beyond that time should be collected, except such as are necessary to keep the canal in repair.

The Committee on the Public Lands, who have been disposed to guard very carefully any bills looking to a grant of public lands, have made a careful examination of this bill, and have unanimously instructed me to report it to the House and ask its immediate passage. I find, from the official reports, that about one-third of the money has been expended for the completion of this canal, and that the parties having the work in charge are already in New York arranging for a loan upon the franchises of the canal for its completion; but, on account of the expiration of the time for its completion, on the 10th of April next, they cannot effect this loan without an extension of time. So that I am warranted in making the statement that if the time is extended it insures the completion of the canal within the time asked for by the terms of the bill, and without the sale of an acre of the public lands until the canal is completed. The committee were unanimous in their recommendations, and believed that this being a meritorious case the bill ought to pass. And if gentlemen will examine it, or will listen to the reading of the report that I send to the desk, I think there will be no objection.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to a question of order. Should not this bill have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Of course; but what the gentleman is asking is unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object.

Mr. BRADLEY. Then I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. I understand the gentleman to say, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, that he is instructed by that committee to ask unanimous consent for the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. So the gentleman stated.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that the bill shall go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That is what the gentleman has asked. If there be no objection the bill will be considered as referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-two minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports from committees are in order, beginning with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

OATHS OF POST-OFFICE OFFICIALS.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1920) to amend section 15 of an act approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department;" which was read a first and second time.

The bill proposes to amend section 15 of the act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department, approved June 8, 1872, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 15. That before entering upon their duties, and before they shall receive any salary, the Postmaster-General, and all persons employed in the postal service, shall respectively take and subscribe, before some magistrate or other competent officer authorized to administer oaths under the laws of the United States or any State or Territory, the following oath:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will faithfully perform all the duties required of me, and abstain from everything forbidden by the laws in relation to the establishment of post-offices and post-roads within the United States; and that I will honestly and truly account for and pay over any money belonging to the United States which may come into my possession or control; and also further swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States. So help me God."

And this oath or affirmation may be taken before any officer, civil or military, holding a commission under the United States; and such officer is hereby authorized to administer and certify such oath or affirmation.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PACKER. The purpose of the bill which I have submitted to the House is this: In the preparation of the act to consolidate the acts relating to the Post-Office Department, in 1872, the framers of the act omitted to put in the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, required by the sixth article of the Constitution and by the act of 1789. This simply remedies that omission in the act of June 8, 1872.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PACKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRANSMISSION OF LAW MANUSCRIPTS BY MAIL.

Mr. DANFORD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 575) to authorize the transmission of certain law manuscripts through the mails at reduced rates of postage.

I will explain that this bill provides that affidavits, depositions, and other legal written evidence may be transmitted through the mails at the same rate of postage as matter passing between author and publisher. The committee have considered the bill, and are unanimous in reporting it back adversely. They see no reason why such matter should pass through the post-office at less than letter postage. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ADVERTISEMENTS FOR MAIL PROPOSALS.

Mr. STOWELL, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 297) to provide for the publication of advertisements for proposals to carry United States mails in the newspaper published in the congressional district where the routes are located having the largest circulation in the district.

Mr. STOWELL. I will state for the information of the House that the present cost of advertising is about $132,000. The Postmaster-General is authorized now to publish these proposals for bids in the papers of every State, not to exceed five in number in each State. If this bill were passed the expense would be some $330,000—an increase of $497,000, or nearly 150 per cent.; and I think, and the committee were unanimous in thinking, that no benefit would be derived from that increased expenditure; that the information would not reach a much larger number of persons than it reaches on the present plan.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I would ask my colleague if he is not incorrect in the statement he makes, so far as the Southern States are concerned? I understand that in the States lately in rebellion that discretion is not vested in the Postmaster-General, but that he is confined to the newspapers selected by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. STOWELL. The law is explicit in giving the Postmaster-General authority to publish in newspapers in each State, not to exceed five, these proposals for bids. The Postmaster-General, in most of the States, publishes them in less than five newspapers. In a majority of the States the proposals are published in less than five. In the State of Rhode Island, and in most of the Southern States, and in some of the smaller Western States, these proposals are published in but two or three newspapers.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I would like to have the construction of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in regard to the law; and I will state that, if my colleague has given it correctly, it differs from the construction of the Postmaster-General himself, who believes that under the present law he has authority only to advertise in the two papers in each of the Southern States designated by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. STOWELL. I think the gentleman will find that the matter is within the discretion of the Postmaster-General, but not obligatory upon him.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. When a committee, during their morning hour, report a bill adversely, what is the pending question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The pending question really is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? pending which the member who reports the bill usually submits a motion that it lie on the table; and the Chair always submits that motion.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That motion is not debatable, though.

The SPEAKER. No; but the real question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

The bill was then laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the several votes by which bills adversely reported have been laid on the table; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF POSTAL CODE.

Mr. STOWELL, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1921) to further amend the postal code; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that section 133 of the revised postal code, approved June 8, 1872, be amended by adding thereto the following:

Any person or persons sending matter of the third class may write upon the wrapper thereof, without any additional charge, the name and address of the sender preceded by the word "from;" and also the name and number of the articles inclosed, and may also write in, or on, any book, pamphlet, magazine, periodical, or any other matter of the third class, a form of presentation, and such additional writing shall not subject such package to any other or higher rate of postage than that chargeable in the absence of such writing.

Mr. STOWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to recommend the passage of this bill. The construction placed by the Postmaster-General on the law is that no one is authorized to write in any way upon matter of the third class, and that if he does so, it subjects it to letter postage. This is often very inconvenient. Persons are very anxious to send off newspapers or books or documents of various kinds, and to let the person to whom they send them know by whom they are sent. According to the present construction, if you write your name on the outside of the wrapper or on the inside, or simply convey the information that one newspaper or one book is inclosed, it subjects the whole package to letter postage. I have here an instance where a Congressional Globe was sent to a gentleman in one of the Territories and the sender simply wrote on the outside the words "printed matter," and the gentleman to whom the package was sent was obliged to pay $1.72 postage, simply because those words were written on the outside of the wrapper of a Congressional Globe.

The Postmaster-General has very recently given this construction to the law, and it subjects all kinds of matter of the third class to letter postage if any information of any kind is written on the wrapper. This bill remedies that evil, and allows the sender to write on the outside his name and the number of the contents of the package; for instance, "one book" or "one newspaper," or his own name.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman. Do I understand him to say that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are of the opinion that the law is in conformity with this decision of the Postmaster-General?

Mr. STOWELL. No, sir; but they desire to remedy this decision of the Postmaster-General. They think his decision rather forced; but under that decision there is no remedy but to pass an explanatory act.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I believe there is no one in this House, who has had any knowledge of these recent decisions of the Postmaster-General and of the laws upon which they are placed, who believes that these decisions are in conformity with existing laws, or who does not believe that the decision of the Postmaster-General, that placing upon the outside of a package of printed matter the information to the Department that it is printed matter would subject the package to letter postage and not postage upon printed matter, is altogether wrong. I do not catch precisely the purport of the first provisions of this bill. I trust they are sufficiently explicit to prevent and supersede any such decisions of the Post-Office Department, which I believe to be in violation of the spirit as well as of the letter of the postal law.

Mr. KASSON. In order that unjust censure may not be passed upon the Postmaster-General, permit me to say that any gentleman who will read section 142 of the postal code will see that it justifies the Postmaster-General in making that decision. I agree with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that this bill is necessary. I do not agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] that the decision of the Postmaster-General is not warranted by the letter of the law.

Mr. STOWELL. Will you read that section?

Mr. KASSON. I am asked to read the section to which I refer, and I will do so from my seat.

Section 142 provides—

Any person who shall inclose or conceal any letter, memorandum, or other thing in any mail matter not charged with letter postage—

Here come the words to which I call especial attention—or make any writing or memorandum thereon, and deposit or cause the same to be deposited for conveyance by mail at a less rate than letter postage, shall for every such offense forfeit and pay five dollars; and such mail matter or inclosure shall not be delivered until the postage is paid thereon at letter rate.

That is the letter of the postal code, and consequently it needs the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] think that any writing or memoranda, giving to the Post-Office Department notification of what are the contents of the package, is any more liable to letter postage than it would be to add a gentleman's occupation to the residence placed upon a package addressed to him; as, for instance, when I direct to "John Smith, grocer," or "John Smith, shoemaker?"

Mr. KASSON. I have only to say that there are the words "any writing or memorandum thereon." Those words justify the construction given by the Postmaster-General. I think that the law should be amended as the committee propose.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state a fact which has come to my knowledge within a week past. I received a written notification from the Postmaster of the House that whenever I had any doubt as to the amount of postage which should be prepaid on any book or package I should write my initials upon it, so that it might be sent by the post-office to me to be corrected. In pursuance of that I paid the postage upon a report of the Comptroller of the Currency; I paid all that was necessary; and in obedience to the suggestion of the Postmaster of the House I put my initials up in the corner—my initials "W. T.," and the initials of my office "M. C." The report went to New York, and the postmaster there held it for postage. He wanted to charge my friend $2.31 for postage upon it, which he refused to pay. It remains there now, for the edification of the clerks of the post-office or to be sold as waste paper.

Mr. STOWELL. The object of the bill is to correct that.

Mr. KELLEY. There is a decision of the court authorizing the putting of initials upon a package.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I ask the Clerk to read an extract, which I send to him, from the New York Commercial Advertiser of the 6th instant.

The Clerk read as follows:

A gentleman entered the post-office this noon with anger in his eye and a sealed package in his hand. The latter had been prepaid to the amount of forty-five cents, and $2.76 was marked as due. It was a United States Treasury document, and its value had thus reached $3.21. The indignant gentleman refused to receive the volume. Extra postage was charged because the package was not only tightly sealed but had the name of a Congressman upon it. For all the Department knew it might have been washing, jewels, or soap. Postmaster James acknowledged that it might be annoying, but pointed to a wrapper recently received by him whereon was marked "due twelve cents," because there was written in a corner "T. C. PLATT, M. C." Congressmen ought to repeal the odious rule in relation to writing the name of the sender in a wrapper, or cease to affix their signatures to documents. There is a huge heap of rejected packages at the post-office, on which fabulous amounts of postage are claimed that will never be paid.

Mr. STOWELL. In addition to this the bill authorizes any person to write inside of the book sent by mail a form of presentation. The signature of the giver is often of value to the receiver, and this bill simply authorizes a form of presentation, preceded by the word "from," not to convey any information beyond that. These are the principal features of the bill.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I did not understand, from the reading of the bill, that it went any further than to permit persons to write their names on the outside of the envelope. I did not catch the portion that provides that there may be writing inside of the package also.

Mr. STOWELL. Nothing beyond the form of presentation.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I am willing to vote for the first provision, but I do not think it would be prudent or wise to go beyond, so as to permit writing inside of the package. I would like to get an opportunity to vote upon the provisions separately, and if I can have the opportunity to do so, I would move to amend the bill by striking out the latter portion. I feel very deeply, in connection with other members of Congress, the necessity of some provision of law by which we can inform our constituents that we send them matter of this kind. In my case, only a short time ago, I made a purchase of a number of pamphlet copies of speeches made by members here, put the stamps upon them, and sent them to my constituents. But I could not notify them that I had sent them those speeches unless by writing a separate letter to that effect.

I believe the want of such a provision as this bill contains is felt by many members of the House so far as regards the superscription of printed mail matter; but many gentlemen here agree with me, I think, in doubting the propriety of going beyond that, and authorizing writing inside of mail matter that pays printed rates.

Mr. STOWELL. I call the previous question.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to say a word.

Mr. STOWELL. The committee have considered this bill fully.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STOWELL] allow the amendment I have indicated to be voted upon?

Mr. STOWELL. The committee have not authorized me to divide the question upon this bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish the gentleman would allow me to have a vote upon an amendment, to add the following clause:

And no additional charge shall be collected for matter heretofore sent by reason of such writing.

Mr. STOWELL. I have no objection to allowing that amendment to be voted upon. I would accept it if I had the power to do so. I renew the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. G. F. HOAR, it was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STOWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREE DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

Mr. PACKER. The House has fixed Thursday next at half-past one o'clock for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 825) to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by the authority of Congress and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the county where published. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have instructed me to ask that the bill be reprinted, for the reason that all the copies already printed are exhausted, and also because the committee have agreed upon a slight amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be reprinted with the amendment.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

INDIAN RESERVATION IN MONTANA.

Mr. AVERILL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1922) to establish a reservation for certain Indians in the Territory of Montana; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that the following-described tract of country, in the Territory of Montana, be set apart for the use and occupation of the Gros Ventre, Piegan, Blood, Blackfoot, River Crow, and such other Indians as the President may, from time to time, see fit to locate thereon, namely: Commencing at the northwest corner of the Territory of Dakota, being the intersection of the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude and the one hundred and fourth meridian of west longitude; thence south to the south bank of the Missouri River; thence up and along the south bank of said river to a point opposite the mouth of the Maria's River; thence along the main channel of the Maria's River to Birch Creek; thence up the main channel of Birch Creek to its source; thence west to the summit of the main chain of the Rocky Mountains; thence along the summit of the Rocky Mountains to the northern boundary of Montana; thence along said northern boundary to the place of beginning.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. AVERILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANNUITIES OF SEMINOLE INDIANS.

Mr. AVERILL also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. AVERILL. The committee have unanimously instructed me to ask the passage of this bill.

The bill was read. It provides that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Interior and the President of the United States, in distributing and paying annuities, interest, or other moneys now due or hereafter to become due to the Seminole tribe of Indians, under the provisions of the eighth article of the treaty between the Creek and Seminole Indians and the United States, concluded August 7, 1856, shall be authorized to expend the same for such objects as will best promote the comfort, civilization, and improvement of the Seminole Indians, or in his discretion, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Interior and the President, shall be authorized to pay such annuities, or any part thereof, into the treasury of the Seminole nation, to be used as the council of the same shall provide, instead of paying the same per capita, according to the terms of said treaty; provided that said agreement shall stipulate that the sum of $7,500 shall be annually appropriated out of said annuity to the school fund of said tribe; and provided further that the consent of the tribe to such expenditures and payment shall be first obtained.

Mr. KASSON. I would like the gentleman to state what is the fund referred to in the bill as arising under the eighth article of the treaty.

Mr. AVERILL. There is a report accompanying the bill; but perhaps I can state the matter in fewer words. In 1856 a treaty was made with the Creek and Seminole Indians by the Government; and in that treaty there was a provision for the investment of $500,000, upon which the interest was 5 per cent., and that was to be an accruing revenue for these Indians, to be paid per capita. This bill provides, instead of paying that $25,000 per capita, it shall be paid into the Indian national council, to be disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and with the consent of these Indians. The object is this: The national council has already far advanced in the arts of civilization. It has established schools and churches. These Indians have taken to the pursuit of agriculture, and given up the chase almost entirely. Instead of allowing this money to be distributed per capita, it is provided it shall be under the control of this council, so that the money may not be improvidently expended. There are many other reasons which I might give, but which I deem unnecessary. It is sufficient to say these Indians themselves in council have expressed themselves favorable to the passage of this bill. They are represented here by chiefs and headmen, and ask that this shall be done. It is recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The peace commissioners also recommend it, and it is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs, from which I have the honor to report it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. AVERILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOAB SPENCER AND JAMES R. MEAD.

Mr. LOWE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1331) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, or cause to be paid, to Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, late the firm of Spencer & Mead, the sum of $7,509.83, and interest on said sum at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, from the 6th day of August, 1867, until paid, out of any money now due and owing, or that may at any time hereafter become due and owing, the Kansas tribe of Indians, in the State of Kansas, from the proceeds arising from the sale of lands owned by said tribe of Indians in said State of Kansas, in full compensation for the goods and provisions furnished said Indians by said Spencer & Mead during the years 1866 and 1867.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LOWE. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that this bill does not make appropriations of money from the Treasury of the United States, but merely authorizes the payment by the Secretary of the Interior, out of an Indian fund, of an obligation due by these Indians. I submit whether it is subject to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. It authorizes the payment of money out of some fund within the control of the United States, or else the United States could not order this payment.

Mr. LOWE. Undoubtedly.

The SPEAKER. Then it goes to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

NORTH CAROLINA CHEROKEES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 11 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870, be amended as follows:

SEC. 11. That this section shall apply to and shall authorize suits against the administrator or administrators of any deceased Indian or Indians of said eastern band of Cherokees, and against the sureties on the bonds of such administrator or administrators, and shall apply to all controversies touching the rights and titles of the eastern band of Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, or any individual of said tribe, to any lands heretofore granted to them by the State of North Carolina, or by their late agent, William H. Thomas, or held in trust for them by him, or contracted by him to be conveyed to the said eastern or North Carolina Cherokees, or any individual of said band, or granted to or contracted to be conveyed to them by any other person, and to all causes of action arising from any wrong or injury done to the property or estate of said eastern band of Cherokee Indians, or to that of any individual thereof, or to the person of any individual of said eastern band of Cherokees, and that such suits in law or equity as may be necessary to establish the rights of the said eastern band of the Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, or the right of any individual member of said tribe to any such lands, and which may be necessary to remedy the other wrongs and injuries hereinbefore mentioned, may be had and maintained in the circuit or district court of the United States for the western district of North Carolina; and all the processes, pleas, and proceedings in such suits, and in the suits herctofore authorized by the eleventh section of the act to which this is an amendment, shall be returnable, cognizable, and determinable only in the circuit or district court of the United States for the western district of North Carolina.

The second section provides that the term "eastern band of the Cherokee Indians," as used in said eleventh section of the act to which this is an amendment, is declared to mean the people of the Cherokee tribe of Indians residing within the limits of the State of North Carolina, and by that name and style any right of action which has accrued, or hereafter may accrue, to the said Cherokee people as a tribe, or as individuals, may be prosecuted in the courts of the United States as provided in this act and in the eleventh section of the act to which this is an amendment.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out the words "SEC. 11. That this," and in lieu thereof insert "said."

Add these words:

This act is not intended in any way to enlarge or abridge any rights, or interfere with the existing relations between the eastern band of Cherokees and the Cherokees residing west of the Mississippi River.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was, as amended, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEZ PERCÉ INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1758) authorizing the purchase of six hundred and forty acres of land for a Nez Percé Indian reservation in the Territory of Idaho.

The bill provides in its first section that the title or interest which was granted by Congress to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, by the act organizing the Territory of Oregon, passed August 14, 1848, or by the act organizing the Territory of Washington, passed March 2, 1853, to that certain tract of land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, occupied by the missionaries of said society as a mission station among the Indian tribes of Oregon, continuously, from 1836 until 1847, situated on Lapwai Creek and Clearwater River, on the Nez Percé Indian reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, shall be purchased by the United States, from whomsoever may be the owner or owners thereof, at a price not exceeding the cash value of the interest or title of said owner or owners in said land.

The bill provides in its second section that the price to be paid for said title or interest shall be ascertained and determined by agreement of the private owner or owners aforesaid and the Secretary of the Interior, or, in case said agreement is not made, the district court of the first judicial district of the Territory of Idaho shall have power and authority, and is hereby directed, to determine the nature and extent of said interest or title, upon the filing of a petition therein by the owner or owners aforesaid, and notice of sixty days or more served upon the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules as said court may prescribe, and shall proceed, by a jury, to assess the actual cash value of the title or interest of said owner or owners, and enter a judgment therefor in favor of said owner or owners against the United States, and shall decree that upon the payment of said judgment all of said title or interest shall be divested from said owner or owners, and shall be vested in the United States, and said decree shall operate as a complete transfer of said title or interest to the United States; provided that in any estimate or appraisal of the value of said title or interest herein provided for, the value of buildings or structures erected or placed upon said lands by or under the authority of the United States shall be excluded.

The bill provides in its third section that in case said value of said title or interest is determined by the agreement of the Secretary of the Interior and the owner or owners as above provided, the Secretary of the Interior shall draw a warrant in favor of said owner or owners on the Treasury of the United States for the said value, which shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided that said warrant shall not be drawn or paid until good and sufficient deeds, conveying said title to the United States, certified by the Attorney-General of the United States, shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. In case said value be determined by the jury and court as aforesaid, the said court shall not enter a judgment except in favor of the person or persons who prove themselves the owner or owners of said title, and the Treasurer of the United States shall pay the person or persons in favor of whom the judgment is rendered the amount of the same, upon the presentation of the properly authenticated copy of the judgment of said court.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. This bill has had the fullest consideration on the part of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is unanimously reported. The facts upon which it is based may be briefly stated.

In 1836 two missionaries, whose homes were in the State of New York, left, under the auspices of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and made the overland journey across the continent. One of these missionaries established his home in the Lapwai Valley, among the Nez Percé Indians; the other of them with a tribe one hundred and twenty miles further west, on the Snake River. They remained for a period of eleven years, teaching the Indians the practice of agriculture and the arts of reading and writing; reduced their language to a written tongue, printed in that language school-books and hymn-books to use in their worship, and raised them from being a wild, wandering band to a tribe having homes, schools, and a printing-press, cultivated fields, and flocks, and herds.

In 1847, just eleven years after their settlement, an Indian outbreak took place, and Dr. Whitman, one of the missionaries, with his wife and eleven other persons living at the station, was slaughtered, and about fifty other persons staying at the mission were taken captives by the Indians. Rev. Mr. Spalding, who occupied this land, was also held as a prisoner, saving himself from slaughter by the promise that he would protect the Indians from retaliation for the slaughter of Whitman. For several weeks he remained a captive. He was permitted by the tribe to send a message to Governor Ogden, of the Hudson's Bay Company, who came to his relief in December, 1847. Governor Ogden came to Walla Walla and opened communication with Mr. Spalding and his family. Mr. Spalding finally consented to leave his reservation, and did so on the 1st day of January, 1848, under the protection of fifty warriors of the Nez Percé tribe, they escorting him to Walla Walla and preventing him from being destroyed by the other hostile tribes.

In August, 1848, the Congress of the United States passed a law organizing the territorial government of Oregon. In that law they inserted, in the first section, the following provision:

And provided also, That the title to the land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said Territory, and improvements thereon, be confirmed and established in the several religious societies to which said missionary stations respectively belong.

It will be perceived by the House that the reservation at that time, August, 1848, was not actually in the possession of the missionaries; that they had been driven out by force and by fear of destruction the winter before; but the buildings they had erected, the fields they had cultivated, the orchards they had planted, were the property of the missionary society. I think it could not well be said that the missionary society was not in legal possession, in August, 1848, of this six hundred and forty acres; but that there might be no doubt left on the subject, the Congress of the United States, on the 2d day of March, 1853, when it carved out of the Territory of Oregon the new Territory of Washington, and established its territorial government, provided as follows in the first section of the act:

Provided further, That the title to the land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said Territory, or that may have been so occupied, as missionary stations, prior to the passage of the act establishing the territorial government of Oregon, with the improvements thereon, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to the several religious societies to which said missionary stations severally belong.

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that the title to these six hundred and forty acres on the Lapwai Creek, reduced to cultivation by these missionaries, became the property of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions by the most solemn possible conveyance. But, sir, the Indian war broke out in 1847, raging until 1859; and in 1859 the United States got possession of the territory, and sent to the Lapwai mission a military officer, who came and took possession. The old missionary, Mr. Spalding, who had lingered in the valley of the Columbia from the day of the slaughter until 1859, presented himself to the United States officer, and asked to be allowed to return to his mission and his tribe, and to continue in the work of civilization. The United States officer denied his right, entered into possession, as he claimed, on behalf of the United States, and has ever since, under the authority, I suppose, of his superior officers, maintained an Indian agency there; and the Government has spent upon that property many thousand dollars, and to-day hold it from the missionaries. Mr. Spalding has, however, returned to the place, and has been allowed to teach these Indians under the employment of the Government of the United States, although all the officers there have refused to recognize any right in him or his society.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill simply proposes this: It proposes that if the Secretary of the Interior and the owners of these lands cannot agree as to the just amount which should be paid them for their title, whatever it is, the owner may appeal to the courts in the Territory of Idaho, within which this land is situated, by petition, and after having served it upon the proper officers of the United States, shall be allowed to have his title determined, and its value estimated by a jury of the vicinity.

I call the previous question.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Has the committee made any investigation in respect to what it will cost the United States to extinguish the title?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. They have been unable to determine what would be a fair value. If we could have determined that question we should have proposed in this bill to make an offer of that amount; but a difficulty has arisen there.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Did the committee make any approximate estimate?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I notice in the bill a provision that this purchase may be made by the Secretary of the Interior on agreement with the owner or owners. I would inquire of the gentleman what security there is that the agreement will be made with the real owners? Would it not be better to leave the whole matter to be settled by the courts?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. The bill provides that no agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the owners of this land shall have effect until the Attorney-General of the United States shall have approved of the settlement and satisfied himself of the nature of their title. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES L. JOHNSON.

Mr. COMINGO, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1924) for the relief of James L. Johnson, surviving partner of Beck & Johnson, authorizing payment for Indian depredations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES PRESTON BECK.

Mr. COMINGO, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1925) for the relief of James Preston Beck, administrator of Preston Beck, jr., deceased, authorizing payment for Indian depredations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment, that I may ask unanimous consent for ten minutes for a personal explanation?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield for that purpose.

No objection was made.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, for the second time, I think, in the course of a service of seven years in the House, I have deemed it due to myself to make a short explanation to the House. I should not do so now were my own personal rights alone involved; but as the matter to which I propose to call the attention of the House involves the action of two of the most important committees, as well as that of a high officer of the Government, I have thought it proper to have the facts fully understood. It has been represented that the Committee on the Judiciary has taken action in a grave matter before it with certain improper views and motives; and it has also been represented that the Committee on Ways and Means has been persistently approached, through myself, by the Secretary of the Treasury upon questions affecting more or less the propriety of his administrative action. As to both these topics I think I can establish in a moment that there is no particle of truth in either statement. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, the extract I have marked in the New York Herald of Saturday last.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House Committee on Judiciary, it is understood, have agreed to report at the earliest practicable moment, the bill of Representative MOREY, of Louisiana, for the establishment of two United States district courts in the State of Louisiana in lieu of Judge Durell's present court. This bill geographically divides the State at the Mississippi River, and provides that the first district court be held in New Orleans, and the second district court at Monroe and Shreveport. It also abolishes Judge Durell's court and his vulnerable officials, and is looked upon by many as a compromise to prevent any further proceedings in the Durell impeachment, although it is rumored that Messrs. WILSON and ELDREDGE, the sub-committee charged by the Judiciary Committee with the investigation of Durell's affairs, have unanimously agreed upon a report in favor of appropriate articles of impeachment, which will be presented to the House Judiciary Committee on Monday next. Hence, as chairman, General BUTLER is anxious to push the Morey bill to a successful conclusion in the House before action is had on the Durell impeachment articles. Messrs. Norton, Barrett, and Billings are much pleased at the turn which the Durell case has taken, and express great hope for the success of the Morey bill, and Norton believes that he can secure his retention in his present position as assignee in bankruptcy by the judge who will be future incumbent of the Orleans district.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now there is not in that paragraph one word of truth.

In the first place, the Committee on the Judiciary have never considered the Morey bill. It was referred to us as I learned this morning for the first time. And in the distribution of our business to sub-committees we referred it to my learned colleague, the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE,] who has never made any report upon or brought it before the committee for consideration.

In the second place, I am instructed by the chairman of the sub-committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] who is not now in his seat, but for whom I have sent, that the sub-committee on the impeachment of Judge Durell have come to no determination whatever in regard to his case; and there has been no consideration of it in the committee for the reason that the evidence has not yet been printed or brought before the committee; and therefore it must have been a concoction of some party who desired to bring the administration of the Government and the action of Congress, through its Committee on the Judiciary, into contempt, especially imputing as the motive of the chairman of that committee inducing him to endeavor to give precedence to the Morey bill in order to stave off the impeachment of Judge Durell. Sir, I never knew till this morning that the Morey bill was before the committee at all, except as I was informed by this newspaper.

Before I proceed further, I desire to send another extract, in regard to the Committee on Ways and Means, to be read, so that the two statements of my supposed delinquencies may be considered together by the House. It is from the New York World of Thursday, February 5, 1874.

The Clerk read as follows:

General BUTLER is hard at work to save his friends in the Revenue Department whose heads are in danger on account of the arrest of Sanborn and others in Brooklyn. He went before the Committee on Ways and Means to-day and made an argument in favor of rescinding the resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information about the iniquitous contracts under which Sanborn has been receiving 50 per cent. of the taxes he has collected. The general is anxious to shield his friends, and appears practically as the attorney of the Treasury Department. It is understood that the committee is inflexible, and will insist on knowing how much money Sanborn and Kelsey got, and from whom it has been collected. The Secretary of the Treasury sends some one to the committee every day now about this matter, and meanwhile holds back the information, hoping that it may be concealed altogether.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now desire to say that I never was before the Committee on Ways and Means on that question at all. I never spoke to either one of them, or to them collectively, upon that or kindred subjects. Those of them who are here now know whether what I state is the fact. I have never spoken to a member of the House on the subject, except to one gentleman who sits near me and who is somewhat interested in the matter, as I suppose, through neighborhood feeling, and I spoke to him only in answer to a question; yet a similar statement has been also published in the New York Tribune, and an article was published in that paper which I send to the Clerk's desk to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Ways and Means Committee have had further conversation to-day in regard to the Sanborn contracts, and in spite of General BUTLER'S attempt to have them held back, still insist that they shall be forthcoming. Sanborn himself, in all the matters, has acted within his contract, but many awkward questions will remain to solve between the Department, the Secretary's Office, and the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, since all the money collected under the contracts has been covered into the Treasury direct, and the receipts of internal revenue have not been credited with it. There have been but few prosecutions under these contracts, since they contain a clause giving the Secretary discretion in the matter of instituting all suits. Mr. Sanborn had, in addition to his contracts, an order from Secretary Richardson to all revenue officers to render Sanborn such assistance as he might require, and this resulted in the regular officer doing the work and those holding the contract receiving half collected.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire now further to say that I never spoke to the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to Mr. Sanborn having or not having a contract until this morning, when I asked him if he had seen these articles in the papers. So much is there of truthfulness in the New York papers.

I have an extract that I desire to have read from a Boston paper. I did go before the Committee on Ways and Means upon a matter of public interest, and I am certain that what I said to them was or was not appreciated by them, and for the present purpose it is quite immaterial which. I ask the Clerk to read the extract I have marked from the Boston Globe.

The Clerk read as follows:

We tried to say, in a brief editorial paragraph in yesterday's Globe, that General BUTLER'S argument in favor of the seizure of books and papers on suspicion hardly deserved serious consideration, but the types perversely made us say just the contrary.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By accident, you see, that newspaper told the truth, but took it back the next day. [Great laughter.] Now what that argument was, what it was about, as there was nobody in the room but the committee, the editor could not and does not know. He could not know whether it was a good, bad, or indifferent one, or whether it was deserving of consideration or not. And yet you have heard his ex cathedra opinion published about that of which he could and did know nothing.

I have felt it to be my duty to myself, I feel it to be my duty to the House, and to the country, and to the proprietors of these newspapers themselves, if these gentlemen who publish them have any sense of honor or propriety, that they should authoritatively know the lies—pardon me, I take that back—the fabricated stories which they pay to have sent over the wires every night and publish to the world as the proceedings here. I assume that they do not know that they are mere fabrications, and therefore they published them. Now, knowing exactly how false these statements are, we shall see whether they really desire to disseminate true or false intelligence about the Congress of the United States.

I have no word of characterization of these studied false reports in the "great metropolitan journals." I am afraid that if I should designate them as I think they should be designated, if I should characterize them in the words with which they deserved to be characterized, I should exceed the bounds of parliamentary propriety, and then we should read essays of accusation upon the blackguardism of the House. But I suppose it is permitted to me to use in this regard the very words which the press have declared to be proper on such occasions, which they, our instructors, have told us is proper language to characterize such statements, which were used by one whom they attempted to make President, and whom they have canonized for his good qualities, when in answer to a statement in the New York Times by Lieutenant-Governor Raymond, he replied, "You lie, you villain; you know you lie." [Great laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. I now renew my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Army bill.

Mr. MOREY. I ask permission to make a brief personal statement. I will not take more than two minutes, I think.

Mr. WHEELER. I will give the gentleman two minutes, or five minutes, but it must go no further.

Mr. MOREY. I was not aware, until I heard this article in the Herald read, that I was considered the especial champion, either by bill or otherwise, of Judge Durell. The bill referred to as the "Morey bill" creating a new judicial district in Louisiana, does not abolish the old one, and does not abolish Judge Durell. It is the same bill, identical in all its provisions, merely changed by including some parishes which have been created since, that was passed without dissent through this House both in the Forty-first and Forty-second Congresses. It is a bill which was reported in the Forty-first Congress by Judge KELLOGG, of Connecticut, and in the Forty-second Congress by Judge WILSON, of Indiana, and was reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary, and passed by the House in both Congresses. That was the same identical bill which is now before the Committee on the Judiciary.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and adopted:

Whereas the First National Bank, of the city of Washington, recently became insolvent, and is now in the hands of a receiver, in consequence, as it is alleged, of lending to or placing in the control of a single firm the whole of its capital stock, as well as a large portion of the money of its depositors, which, if true, is in palpable violation of the national-banking act; and whereas the circumstances attending the failure of said bank, and the character of the management under which so gross a violation of the law, if said statements are true, could have taken place, demand an investigation, to the end that remedies may be applied to guard against like frauds in the future: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to examine into the condition of said bank at the time of its failure, and into its prior transactions and general management; that they have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to report by bill or otherwise.

IMPROVEMENT OF SAGINAW RIVER, MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of February 4, 1874, transmitting a report of the survey and an estimate of cost for the improvement of the Saginaw River, in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General of Subsistence, giving their views upon certain classes of claims growing out of the late war; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY CONTRACTS FOR RECOVERY OF TAXES, ETC.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 27, 1874, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 8, 1872, contracts made by the Treasury Department under said act.

Mr. DAWES. I move the reference of this communication to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. KENDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1926) in relation to lands heretofore granted to railroad companies; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

IMPORTATION OF CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. No. 1584) to prevent the importation of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, was presented to the House by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

SEC. 2. That all balances of appropriations, for whatever account, made for the service of the Department of the Quartermaster-General, which at the passage of this act shall remain undrawn upon the books of the Treasury, except such as the Auditor of the Treasury, whose duty it is to settle accounts against such appropriations, shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary in the settlement of such accounts pending in his office, and except the balances remaining from such appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, respectively, shall be carried to the surplus fund.

Mr. WHEELER. In order that the subject-matter embraced in sections 2, 3, and 4 may be considered as a whole, I propose, when we come to the fourth section, to move the following amendment:

Provided, That all such claims now pending and undetermined in the Department of the Quartermaster-General and the Department of the Commissary-General of Subsistence shall, on the passage of this act, be transferred to the said commissioners of claims, and such transfer shall be regarded as presentation within the meaning of this act.

I desire to make a correction of a statement which I made in the opening discussion upon this bill—that these claims are now heard solely by the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General, and that there is no power of review excepting a mathematical review. In that I was mistaken. The Third Auditor of the Treasury tells me that he exercises the right of rejecting these claims or reducing their amount when he thinks improper allowances have been made.

While upon the floor I wish to make one further correction. I stated the other day, in reply to some remarks from the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] that the acting Quartermaster-General advised and assented to the amendment which I offered in regard to the use of old clothing by the Army. That officer tells me that he did not intend to go to that extent; that while he furnished me with a list of articles which he said might be used, and also gave me a statement of their value, he did not think it was his province to advise that they should be used, and he did not wish to be so understood. I desire that this most excellent and efficient officer should have the full benefit of this explanation. He says he intended to leave to me the responsibility of recommending the use of that old clothing; and I am willing to assume the responsibility.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question or two?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In the first place, I wish to inquire whether the sense of the House upon this subject cannot be obtained by moving to strike out these sections, thus bringing up the whole question. I desire to make that motion, if it be in order, with the view that if the House should refuse to strike out the sections, they may then be amended so as to authorize different rules of evidence and an extension of the period of time in which claims may be filed.

Mr. WHEELER. The motion to strike out can apply only to the pending section. Of course the motion to strike out that section is in order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Then I make the motion that the pending section be struck out. In submitting this motion, I wish to say, coming from a section of country largely interested in a number of claims now pending before the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General, that in the opinion of these claimants they have a fairer and a better chance of being heard and having their claims acted upon, and I will add, they believe they will be more justly dealt with before those officers than before the board of southern claims commissioners.

Nearly all the olaims pending in the Quartermaster-General's and the Commissary-General's offices have made considerable progress. They have been examined in a very great measure, and they are now almost ready for final action. To take them from these offices and throw them before this court is to postpone and delay action. Then sir, I apprehend when they do go before this board of southern claims commissioners, different rules of evidence, at least a different spirit, will characterize that board from the action of the officer at the head of the Commissary-General's and the Quartermaster-General's offices. I have to say on the part of the people whom I in part represent that they are satisfied with the spirit of fairness and justice now prevailing in these two offices. They are not satisfied with the spirit which prevails in the board of the southern claims commissioners. With that board it seems to be a rule first to believe the claim when presented is not founded in merit. Then, after having passed that, they set a rule of damages as to the value of the property, which does injustice to the people of Kentucky and Tennessee. In this their rule of action seems first to obtain the value of a given amount of property, as it were, where trade was uninterrupted, and without any embarrassment whatever, and, having ascertained that, then they strike a balance, as it were, one-half of that value, and render their judgment accordingly.

Then again, Mr. Chairman, taking what the board of southern claims commissioners has already done or accomplished, we see, if you put this additional amount of toil on them, this additional examination, the grandchildren of these claimants may be petitioners before the Government for payment of what the Government justly owes them. There can be no action on them during the life-time of the present claimants unless you increase the board. This delay is unjust, therefore, to those parties who have suffered incidentally through the war, suffered really by the loss of their property, that loss being the use the Government has made of it. They are entitled to speedy compensation; not to have delayed action. They are entitled to present pay. You have taken, and you have used, their property, and you are not paying interest on that debt. It is unjust and unfair to them. Therefore, sir, it is that I, as one of the Representatives from the State of Tennessee, am opposed to this transfer, and hope the House will strike out that section.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not make the point of order on the gentleman from Tennessee while he was upon the floor, but he has been discussing the fourth section of the bill, and I will answer what he has alleged when we reach that section.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to say a word or two.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word or two at this point. I hope the committee will consent that the second, third, and fourth sections be considered together.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to that at all.

Mr. BECK. They are all parts of one plan. The second section requires the Commissary-General to pay his balances into the Treasury, the third section requires the Quartermaster-General to pay his balances into the Treasury, and the fourth section provides for the court by which these balances, which are used to pay claims, shall be disposed of. Until we have all these subjects before us it is hardly possible to determine properly what action shall be taken in regard to any of them.

I wish to say, in addition, I disagree with what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] has said. I believe all the balances in the hands of the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General should be paid into the Treasury of the United States, only to be paid out by the decision of a court.

I believe, however, the fourth section ought to be amended by a substitute which I hold in my hand, or something like it, referring all these matters to the Court of Claims. That is a court of the United States, where evidence can be laid before it; where books and papers can be produced; where men can get justice, and no favoritism can be allowed without its being exposed. I object to the present system of requiring claimants to go before the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General, because there is no law to govern them but their own will and such regulations as they see fit to make. There are no legal means of examining into evidence which may be controverted if untrue; no means of requiring these officers to show what evidence has been produced in opposition to any claim; and when the question comes to be discussed, I think I can show that there has been more corruption, that there has been more wrong done to claimants appearing before these departments—I make the statement without imputing any wrong to the officers themselves—than by any other system that can be well suggested. I know that corrupt men have gone before them and thrown obstacles in the way of the payment of claims, tying them up so that payment had to be denied; and when the patience, hopes, and resources of claimants were exhausted, these same men have come in and removed the obstacles which they themselves placed in the way of the payment of the claim, after the claimant, in despair, had agreed to pay them one-half or two-thirds of whatever sum of money should be collected.

I want to pass laws to render these things impossible, by requiring all claimants to go before the courts of the country, where equal and impartial justice can be openly administered under rules applicable equally to all. It will be better for the Quartermaster-General, better for the Commissary-General, and better for the country, that these things should go before the law tribunals of the country, and there be decided, where claimants and the people can see what has been done; where the United States can be represented; and where all objections can be answered. When we come to the fourth section, believing that this southern claims commission is not the proper tribunal to accomplish the reforms I desire to see established in this regard, I will endeavor to offer a substitute, referring all these claims to the Court of Claims, and will ask a vote upon it. I want to have it read for the information of the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that the Committee on Appropriations will be just as well satisfied by these claims going to the Court of Claims as by their going to the commissioners of claims. Their idea as to this is the same as that of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the claims should have a judicial determination.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow the substitute which I have prepared for the fourth section to be read now?

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That all claims of citizens, not now pending before the southern claims commission, who remained loyal adherents to the Government of the United States, for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion, for the use of the Army of the United States, and for the use or loss of vessels or boats while employed in the military or naval service of the United States, or for property used for military purposes, including any such claims now pending and not finally disposed of in any Department of the Government, shall be presented within one year from the passage of this act to the United States Court of Claims, which court shall have jurisdiction of the same; and all such claims which shall not be presented within the time herein specified shall be barred, and shall not be entertained without further authority of Congress: Provided, That where the claimant is a minor, or feme-covert, or person laboring under any other disability at the time of the passing of this act, then every such person shall have one year and no more, from the date of the removal of such disability, in which to present such petition.

Mr. THORNBURGH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Two amendments are pending, and debate on them is exhausted.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I think we should understand where we are. We have been considering the third section. Is it the understanding of the committee that the third and fourth sections shall be considered as pending together?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. THORNBURGH.]

Mr. THORNBURGH. I do not approve of the sections as they stand in the bill, nor yet of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] I believe that neither of those propositions will do justice to those who have claims pending. I believe they will do great injustice to those having claims pending in the departments of the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General, causing them much delay, and that they will result in the end in the repudiation of a large number of these claims. If they are to be transferred to the Court of Claims, attorneys are to be employed, new evidence is to be taken to conform to the rules there prescribed, and new expenses will be incurred; and many of these claims are for amounts so small that they will not justify the incurring of these expenses on the part of claimants who have been for years and years since the war attempting to get their claims adjudicated by the Departments of the Government.

There is this day a large class of claims pending in the Quartermaster-General's Department, and I have his authority, in the evidence taken before the House Committee on Military Affairs, for saying that decisions will soon be made if no such transfer shall take place. If by this bill you transfer them to the claims commissioners, the result will be that large numbers of the claims of which the Quartermaster-General takes jurisdiction, under the act of March 4, 1871, will be excluded, repudiated, thrown aside, and will not be paid, simply because you have made this transfer.

To make my meaning plainer, I will say that the act of March 3, 1871, gives jurisdiction only of claims of persons remaining loyal through the war; and they hold that any disloyal act committed through the entire war is an act by which their claims are barred, so that they can get no relief. This is not the rule in the Quartermaster-General's Department. If a man came forward and took the oath under any of the proclamations of the President, and remained loyal after taking that oath, and furnished supplies to the Government of the United States after he had taken the oath, he is a loyal man, within the act of July 4, 1864, and his claim is allowed. Now, sir, what is to become of every single claim of this character if this transfer be made? Every one of them, by the rules established by the precedents of adjudications made by the claims commissioners, is thrown aside, and every claimant is left without any remedy for the debt the Government owes him.

Again, Mr. Chairman, this change will result, in my judgment, in causing still further and longer delay in the payment of these claims. Many years have elapsed since these debts were incurred. Claimants have been at the expense of getting up their evidence and employing their agents in attempting to get their claims passed upon by some tribunal. They have not as yet succeeded, and the consequence is this, that there are nearly twenty thousand claims before the southern claims commission, and twelve thousand before the Quartermaster-General's and Commissary-General's Departments; and every committee of this House which has to do with such claims has its committee-room flooded with them. Well, sir, if we transfer these and increase the number of claims to be decided by the claims commissioners, when will they ever be decided?

I hope this bill, in the shape it now is, will not be passed. If we are to have legislation on this subject, let the question come before the Committee on War Claims, let it be discussed, and let justice be done, not only to the Government, but to the men who furnished supplies to our armies when cut off from transportation—supplies which were either taken without pay or were furnished by loyal men in order that our armies might go on and conquer the rebellion.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to reply for a moment, at this point, to some of the objections made by the gentleman from Tennessee. I have looked over the speech which he made on Saturday last on the subject of war claims, and I see that he has fallen into error as to the work done by the claims commission. He said that during the first year they disposed of only one hundred and eighty claims.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I said that altogether they had disposed of less than five hundred.

Mr. WHEELER. Now I desire to show the comparative speed made in the settlement of these claims before the Departments and the claims commission, and to present a simple statement as to the work done by those tribunals.

Mr. SENER. I would ask the gentleman if he proposes to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. WHEELER. I have said this, that it is entirely immaterial to me or the Committee on Appropriations whether you send these outstanding claims to the Court of Claims or to the commissioners of southern claims—entirely immaterial. I am not prepared to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky as it was read, although I might agree to it with some modifications; but as to the tribunal, it is entirely immaterial whether these claims go to the Court of Claims or to the commissioners. We want simply that all these claims shall have a judicial hearing and determination.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee states that there are a great many cases now ready. I ask the gentleman a simple question in the rule of three. The Quartermaster-General states in his report that last year he disposed of 567 claims. I ask the gentleman how long at that rate it will take him to dispose of the 11,347 claims yet remaining unsettled? Sir, it would take him eleven and a half years at the same rate of speed at which he progressed last year.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I would ask the gentleman if he is not satisfied that the claims already filed before the claims commission will take them at least five years to decide?

Mr. WHEELER. I am not satisfied of that fact. I know, and does not the gentleman from Tennessee know, that hundreds of these cases never progress beyond the mere filing, and it is a mistake to assume that they have all to be thoroughly examined. I believe that the claims commission can, within the next five years, dispose of every claim which shall be brought before them.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Then, sir, if the claims now pending in the Quartermaster's Department are referred to the commission, will they not at the end of the next five years have five thousand cases undisposed of?

Mr. WHEELER. I say that it will take the Quartermaster-General eleven and a half years to dispose of the cases already on file at the rate at which he is progressing.

Mr. THORNBURGH. At the end of five years there will be five thousand claims undisposed of before the commission, if you adopt this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise simply to ask a question of my friend who has charge of the bill, and it is this: whether these claims which are to be so transferred cover claims for the rent of buildings used by the Army?

Mr. WHEELER. They do not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have long been of the opinion that that class of claims is one of the most meritorious and most easily ascertained as to its validity of any of the claims made for the use of property during the war. If a man comes and says that his property was taken and is gone, you must depend upon the testimony of living witnesses, or dead ones, as to what the value of the property was when taken. But in the case of the rent of a building belonging to a loyal man the building is always there to show for itself what it is worth and what its probable worth was during the war, and yet we never have provided for that class of claims.

Mr. WHEELER. I would say to the gentleman that under an old act of 1818, the Quartermaster's Department is paying claims for rent. They never took jurisdiction of them under the act of 1864, but they are doing so under the act of 1818, and this bill does not disturb that class of claims. In addition to that, notwithstanding the act of 1864, the Court of Claims takes jurisdiction of claims for rent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not in disloyal States; and I am speaking of them. I have a case in my mind of an officer in the Navy of the United States, who was on board our fleet doing his whole duty. He owned a house in the South which he was very glad to have occupied by the troops of the United States, and yet he says he can find no tribunal where he can get a hearing for the rent due him.

Mr. WHEELER. Many claims of that sort are decided by the Quartermaster's Department under the act of 1818.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; he has been to the Quartermaster's Department, and they say they cannot pay any claim for rent except where there was a contract for it. There is the trouble. Therefore all these claims are not provided for anywhere. And I would suggest that if we are going to send all these claims in the Quartermaster-General's Department to the southern claims commission, that would be a subject which it would be well enough to consider.

Mr. WHEELER. It has not been the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations to enlarge the jurisdiction of the southern claims commission through an appropriation bill. If it ought to be done it should be done by a bill from the appropriate committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I only called the attention of the committee to the subject. I do not suppose it would be proper to move such a provision as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rise for the purpose of making a few remarks in support of the original proposition submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] to strike out section 2 of this bill, and to give my reasons for that support. Those reasons cannot properly be given unless sections 2, 3, and 4 are considered together. Section 2 takes away a certain fund now in the control of the Quartermaster-General for the payment of claims, and section 4 transfers that class of claims from the Quartermaster-General's Department to the claims commission. I am opposed to the transfer of the fund, and I am opposed to the transfer of these claims from the tribunal where they now are to any other tribunal whatever.

I think it is very illiberal in a great Government like ours, that has once said to our creditors, "Go before a certain court, present your claims, and if properly proven and they are just and right we will pay them;" and after they have been before that tribunal for years and years, and have expended money and time in the presentation of their claims, I think it is illiberal for the Government then to say that it will arbitrarily, and contrary to the wish of its creditors, transfer those claims to another and a different court. I think it is nothing but right and proper that the members of this House should at least consult the wishes of the creditors of the Government in this respect. In the first place, the Government fixed the tribunal before which these creditors should go. They were told to go there; they did go; and having done so, I think it but right and proper that this House should now consult the wishes of those creditors.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent, during the war was run all over and devastated in every part by both armies, Federal and confederate—whole towns were destroyed, churches burned, bridges burned, and a vast amount of property taken and destroyed—yet she never has been repaid one dollar for any part or portion of her loss. The loyal citizens who were taxed to carry on the war, who were taxed to support the Government, from whom were taken supplies for the Army—horses, provender, corn, wheat, and other supplies; whose fences were burned by the Army—have been invited to go before the Quartermaster-General and present their claims, and they were told that if proven they should be allowed. Now, after they have been at this expense for long years, this bill proposes to transfer them arbitrarily to another court. It is shown by the report of the commissioners of claims that there are now before that commission undecided, seventeen thousand claims. They have been deciding them only at the rate of seventeen hundred a year. If they go on at that same rate it will take that southern claims commission, to dispose of the claims now before it, more than ten years. And if you add to them the claims now before the Quartermaster-General, you might just as well confiscate those debts due to the loyal men of the border States, and tell them to go out of court altogether.

Many of the claims have already passed the Quartermaster-General. He has given them his sanction and sent them to the Third Auditor. Nearly all of them are in the process of settlement. Hundreds and thousands of them in a short time will be settled; these men will receive their money if they are allowed to remain where they are now. But transfer them to the southern claims commission, and these men will have to employ other attorneys and go to additional expense, and they might as well abandon their claims at once. You might as well confiscate into the Treasury of the United States the thousands of dollars that belong to loyal men for property taken from them during the war. In their name I protest against this transfer, and desire that their claims may remain where they now are.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Chairman, this debate seems to be taking somewhat of a wide range. The proposition now under consideration seems to be involved in three sections, and on them I desire to say a few words, and to call the attention of members to the proposition that is really made by these three sections.

Whether we gave this jurisdiction to the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General wisely or not is a question that I do not now care to go into. But I do say, with a knowledge, too, of the character of the tribunal, that you require of these military officers the performance of judicial duties without giving them judicial appliances. You require them to sift evidence, and you give them no means to compel evidence. You require them to pass upon the question whether a man is a creditor of the United States under the law, and you give them no means of compelling testimony for the United States before either the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General. The whole thing is wrong all the way through. It is a duty placed upon these officers which does not belong to them, which has no connection with their offices, and which they cannot possibly intelligently and fairly perform.

And I state here, and every gentleman who has had anything to do with these officers will bear me out in this statement, that these claims are not passed upon by either of these officers, but are determined in all material points by the clerks in their offices. That is the danger and difficulty in this transaction. That men who claim to be creditors of the Government should have the right to a speedy and impartial hearing is unquestionably true; but it is also true that the United States should have on their part the full opportunity of being heard, of compelling testimony whenever it may be necessary, and of having judicial determination upon the facts thus presented. That is the reason the proposition to transfer all these claims as they stand from these two branches of our military service to a court——

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HURLBUT. Certainly.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Although I agree with the gentleman in his argument, I think it is based on a mistake of fact. There is a provision in the law for these Departments taking testimony, and, on applying to the Department of Justice, having counsel for the United States. To be sure this provision is never practically called into use; it is a circuitous mode of proceeding, and I agree with the gentleman that it is not a sufficient provision. I merely wished to remind the gentleman that there is such a provision.

Mr. HURLBUT. There is, as my friend states, the possibility under the law of a resort to that roundabout method. But, as a matter of fact, the claimant and the defendant are never brought face to face in equal right. All the elements of a court are wanting.

I do not care particularly to what tribunal these cases may go; but let it be a daylight tribunal where men shall present their claims openly and where public notice shall be taken of them; so that officers, for example, who may happen to have commanded in that region of country shall know the men who claim to be creditors of the United States, sometimes honestly and sometimes fraudulently. I have had some of these cases referred to myself by the officers of the Quartermaster's Department; and I know something of the mode in which business is done there. Besides, there exists a constant temptation—a temptation to which it is not wise to subject any man—arising from the possibility of collusion between fraudulent claimants and the inferior clerks in the office. In this respect especially the present system is dangerous and wrong. No man who has an honest claim against the Government ought to object to the most thorough investigation of that claim in the most public, open, and notorious manner.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Chairman, I have sought the floor to say a word on this provision of the Army appropriation bill for the reason that a large number of my constituents have unsettled claims against the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HEREFORD. I withdraw my amendment; the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] can renew it.

Mr. SPEER. I have an amendment which I propose to offer—an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order until we reach the fourth section. The Chair would suggest that no amendment be sent up until the section to which it applies is reached, as a contrary practice creates confusion with the clerks.

Mr. SPEER. Perhaps the reading of the bill had better be proceeded with until we come to that part where the amendment will be in order.

Mr. BECK. Yes; let the sections be considered together.

The Clerk read the third and fourth sections of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. That all balances of appropriations, for whatever account, made for the service of the Department of the Commissary-General of Subsistence, which at the passage of this act shall remain undrawn upon the books of the Treasury, except such as the Auditor of the Treasury whose duty it is to settle accounts against such appropriations shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary in the settlement of such accounts pending in his office, and except the balances remaining from such appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1872, June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, respectively, shall be carried to the surplus fund.

SEC. 4. That all claims of citizens who remained loyal adherents to the cause and Government of the United States during the war for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States, and for the use or loss of vessels or boats while employed in the military service of the United States, including any such claims now pending and undetermined in any Department of the Government, shall be presented before the 1st day of November, 1874, to the commissioners of claims created by act of March 3, 1871, who shall have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine the same. And all said claims which shall not be presented to said commissioners on or before said day shall be barred, and shall not be entertained without further authority of Congress: Provided, That nothing herein shall be deemed to affect or impair the limitation for the time for the presentation of petitions prescribed by section 2 of the act of March 3, 1873. Such commissioners shall, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1871, and the acts in amendment thereof, receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims as shall be brought before them, and shall make report of their proceedings, and of each claim considered by them, at the commencement of each session of Congress to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. For the fourth section the gentleman from Kentucky offers a substitute.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not want to get into any confusion, or let the Committee of the Whole get into confusion; therefore I ask, is it understood that the committee have passed the second and third sections?

Mr. BECK. No, sir.

Mr. SPEER. I understood that the committee were considering the sections together.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to the sections being considered together, but I wish them to be acted upon separately. I understand the pending question to be on an amendment to strike out the second section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] insist upon his amendment to strike out the second section?

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir; I desire a vote upon that amendment.

Mr. SENER. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the legislation upon this subject, as proposed in the bill, is unjust both to the loyal citizen in a loyal State and to the loyal citizen in what was known as the disloyal States. According to an official paper which I have before me, there have been presented at the Quartermaster-General's Office some thirty-two thousand claims, of which twenty thousand have been passed upon, leaving about twelve thousand to be considered in that Department. Now, the effect of the legislation proposed in this bill will be to apply two different rules—to allow the loyal citizen, who has presented his claim and had it audited and determined, to get his pay, while the loyal citizen who has not had the opportunity to present his claim must go before a board of claims commissioners where a lawyer is essential to the prosecution of any claim, while before the Quartermaster-General's Department any citizen may go and have his claim properly heard and considered.

I have investigated this matter somewhat; and I am assured that in the examination now given to these claims before the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General, the most ample investigation is made; that the officers in the respective districts where the supplies are said to have been taken are notified to make the strictest investigation. In confirmation of this I have on my desk a statement showing that in the Commissary-General's Office three-fourths of the claims that have been presented have been disallowed, and that in that office to-day there are only about twelve hundred cases undetermined.

The Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General consider that there is a defect in the law of 1864, under which they are acting. They are required merely to report upon these claims to the Third Auditor. If there is sufficient testimony to establish the claims, they report them favorably; but if, on the contrary, there is not sufficient evidence they merely hold the claims in abeyance; they do not allow, or absolutely disallow, them; they hold them in that suspended condition waiting for more testimony. Those officers believe that the law ought to be amended so that the claims which they disallow may be considered as finally rejected after a certain date.

Now, sir, the proposed legislation will be unjust in its operation upon the loyal citizen in the States that were disloyal, for the reason that already the board of southern claims is already burdened with seventeen thousand cases, which it has not had the opportunity to hear and consider. Five thousand cases only have been determined in three years. At the same rate it will take that commission nine years to hear and decide these cases.

There is also a provision now pending before a learned committee of this House charged with that duty to extend the time so other claimants from disloyal States may have an opportunity to come in for a hearing. If these claims are brought in it will, at the same rate of consideration in these other cases, take, in order to determine them, at least twelve or fifteen years. This board of southern claims commissioners is already sufficiently burdened. I say, therefore, it is unjust to crowd them with any other cases. Send them to the Court of Claims, if you will, but do not send them to the southern claims commission, which was not created for this purpose, and which is not now adequate to the discharge of the duty for which it was created.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Committee of the Whole will not lose sight of the real purpose of these sections in the discussion of the details of the plan.

The first question of all for the House to determine is whether they are willing to allow the accumulation of unexpended balances running back indefinitely, as it seems to have been allowed in the War Department according to the developments made in the study of the subject by the Committee on Appropriations. It appears accumulations for not less than six years have been made for settlement of War Department claims; that is, for supplies furnished of various sorts and sizes during the war. We supposed the act of July 8, 1870, turned in all unexpended balances every two years from the date of the appropriation bill, but it has been so construed that if one day before the two years expired a claim is filed which might be paid if the claim were allowed out of any appropriation, that appropriation is considered to have two years more to run. That is an evasion of the law, or at least a different rendering of the law from what Congress intended.

There is another thing which gentlemen will see the justice of. It is unjust to charge to the expenses of the Army—of our current military establishment—expenses year by year of old war expenses for supplies given to the Army during the war, and yet, so long as the present order exists, there will come anywhere between one and five millions of payments out of the Treasury, which apparently increases the expenses of our military establishment, but which are, in fact, payments of old debts for supplies during the war. The Committee on Appropriations desire to dislocate all this class of claims from the present military establishment, so that we may make a clean appropriation for the Army and its current expenses, and make appropriations for paying off old war debts by themselves.

This is a matter of business and a matter of good statesmanship, and I hope gentlemen will not lose sight of these two important points: First, that accumulated balances here turned in by these two sections, to the amount of five and a half millions, shall be covered back into the Treasury, and shall not be allowed thus to accumulate; and, secondly, the Army shall stand on its own legs, and be responsible for its own expenses, and payments of war claims shall stand by themselves, and be treated on their own merits.

Give us separation first of all. Pass the first section and you have cut apart these two incoherent classes of things which ought not to be joined together. Then when you come to the section next to the last, if we have not referred to the proper tribunal, then refer it to the proper tribunal. If the tribunal to which it is referred has not sufficient power and force to do this, give it sufficient power and force. We are not proposing to obstruct the payment of claims at all, but we simply say it is unfair to the Treasury, and especially unfair to the War Department, to allow these accumulations.

I wish to say in addition it is particularly unfitting and improper that clerks in the different Departments shall be considered as judges and triers of claims. Who settles a claim? Here comes a man with a claim for $100,000 for supplies furnished during the war. He goes to the Quartermaster-General's Department. The Quartermaster-General cannot do all the work himself, and he refers him to some Bureau. And it goes down to a clerk in one of these divisions, who is intrusted with the business, and that clerk, sitting at a desk, does in fact become the judge and jury. He makes up the case, he makes the determination, and it is too much for human nature to suppose that the hundreds of clerks in the various Departments are competent, and not only competent, but that they have the requisite characteristics of mind, and of morals as well as mind, to stand all the strain of this class of cases and to have them passed in this irregular way. The cause both of good morals and good statesmanship requires that this change shall be made.

Mr. HEREFORD. I withdraw my amendment, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] may renew it.

Mr. POTTER. If I understand aright what the pending amendment is, it is that of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] to strike out the second section. I renew the amendment to strike out the last word of that amendment for the purpose of saying a few words upon the question it presents.

Of course if we strike out this section, which is the question now being considered by the committee, the effect will be to leave the claims involved where they are now, with the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General. But if we retain this section, the further question will remain, what tribunal shall be put in the place of the tribunals which now exist for the adjudication of these claims; that is, instead of the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General. I may have something to say on that further question when we come to it. But, primarily, I am not in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia to strike out the second section of this bill, because I am not in favor of seeing the determination of these claims remain where it now is; and I seek their removal to some other tribunal for this reason, if for nothing else, that the heads of these departments do not themselves want to retain the adjudication of those claims. As I understand, they acknowledge that that is not a fitting place to determine them.

Mr. HEREFORD. They make no such recommendation in the report.

Mr. POTTER. I understood the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER] who has charge of the bill, to say so.

Mr. WHEELER. I said, on the authority of the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General, that they had desired to be rid of these claims, because they obstructed the current business of their offices.

Mr. HEREFORD. All I said was that there is no such recommendation in the report.

Mr. WHEELER. I am aware of that; but such is the feeling they have expressed.

Mr. POTTER. That fact, of itself, has very great force, to my judgment. I think it is due to the officers of the Army to say that in dealing with money matters, from the foundation of this Government, they have been, in a high degree, without reproach. Until the Government introduced into the Army, at the close of the war, some men who had not been regularly educated for it, there was scarcely a case in the Army of defalcation or abuse of moneys by those officers to whom the distribution of funds was intrusted. During the last seventy-five years the trusts of this description which have been administered by officers of the regular Army have been administered with a fidelity worthy of all praise, and often for very insufficient compensation.

When, therefore, the heads of these departments tell us that they do not want to retain this business, that it conflicts with the general duties of their offices, and that they cannot administer the duties satisfactorily to themselves, I think it is high time for us to provide some other tribunal.

But, besides that, I am impressed with the view which has been presented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] He has said that the determination of these claims is judicial. And if there be anything valuable in our system of government, it is the separation of the judicial from the executive and the legislative branches of the Government; leaving one department to make the laws, another to determine what the laws are, and another to administer them.

Again, I think the question is not—as has been suggested by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD]—how little of these claims can be allowed, but how justice shall be done. Nor, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] is the question, what is due to this department or that department of the Government; but what is due to the claimants. It is the first business of government to do justice, not to grant favors; and it is our duty as Representatives to provide a tribunal where citizens having claims against the Government can be heard without delay, and where claims shall be promptly determined; where those that are unfounded shall be promptly rejected, and where those that are just shall be as promptly recognized and settled.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the question now before the committee is as to striking out section 2 of the bill, which proposes to cover back into the Treasury some former appropriations that were made. It seems to me that so far as that proposition goes it is clearly right. I have in my hand a paper from the office of the Quartermaster-General, from which it appears that $199,395.93 still remain of an appropriation made for the year 1870 to the Quartermaster-General's Office; also an item of $122,000 for incidental expenses for the same year; also $14,073 for the purchase of horses for the same year; barracks $50,000; transportation of the Army, $755,000; transportation of officers' baggage, $23,000; clothing, $214,000; appropriation for stores, $34,000. Then there are also balances for the years ending 30th June, 1871, 1872, and 1873, amounting to a vast sum of money, which it occurs to me ought to be covered back into the Treasury; and then let us know what we are called upon to appropriate, and for what purposes our appropriations are to be applied.

Now, sir, if the further proposition be also under consideration, to take from the Quartermaster's Department and the Commissary-General's Department the consideration of these claims, I must say, from what little experience I have had, and that has not been inconsiderable, in settling the accounts of the Army, that the Quartermaster's Department is the best to settle all accounts which occur by reason of the equipping or transportation of the Army. And, further, that the Commissary-General's Office is the department in which ought to be settled all accounts for subsistence of the Army. That is their business; that is the thing to which they have been schooled, and it occurs to me that by reason of having within their possession the proper means of information they are better fitted to settle these accounts than any other department can be. Now, allow me further to say, that if these departments are overworked and have not time properly to hear and determine the question of these claims, it occurs to me that there are a sufficient number of officers of the Army who could be detailed at once and set to work on these claims, and it ought to be done in justice to the loyal people and the other people who are entitled to pay for what they furnished to the Government. Their claims ought to be considered, and considered speedily, and it seems to me it is no excuse to say that the departments are overworked; because there is a sufficient number of officers educated for the purpose who could be detailed and sent all over the country where these claims arise, and investigate them. Sir, they should investigate them, and they should do it soon. It occurs to me as unfair to turn all this vast class of claims over to the Court of Claims, which is already overworked, and has not within itself the right, power, and means to bring to it witnesses through officers as the Army has.

Now, for these reasons it occurs to me that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] is right in what he asks for his constituents, that their claims shall be considered, and considered by the department which contracted the claims, and that is the Army, and should not be turned over to a dilatory court for a consideration of their cases.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. POTTER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the amendment. All I desire to do, sir, is to call the attention of the House to the views expressed by the Secretary of War with reference to the policy of taking away from the Commissary-General and the Quartermaster-General these claims. I desire that the views expressed by the Secretary of War before the Committee on Military Affairs, and by them reported to the House, be read. The Clerk will please read the passage I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. THORNBURGH. Suppose that the Quartermaster's Department and the Commissary-General of Subsistence's Department were relieved of the settlement of the claims filed by persons who furnished stores for the Army during the late rebellion, would that materially lessen the expense of those departments?

Secretary BELKNAP. It might lessen to a very small amount the expenses of the departments, but I think it would involve an expenditure of a very large amount of money, by the payment by the Government of fraudulent claims.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Is there anything connected with settlement of those claims which makes the staff departments peculiarly fitted to pass upon questions arising under them?

Secretary BELKNAP. Yes, sir; there are a great many of those claims in the departments, and they impose a burdensome duty on these departments; but at the same time I am satisfied that their officers are peculiarly fitted to examine them, and I think that the result of that examination is the saving of a large amount of money to the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems from this statement of the Secretary of War that in his judgment the interests of the Government require that these claims should be retained in the Quartermaster-General's and Commissary Departments. I would suggest to the gentleman having charge of the bill that the commission to which it is proposed that these claims shall be referred is already a source of very heavy expense to the Government, costing at least over $50,000 a year. I speak of the matter as one of economy, without reference to the question of the early adjustment of these claims.

Mr. WHEELER. On the score of economy, I want to say that the acting Commissary-General says that by the adoption of this amendment of the committee to the bill he will be able to spare thirty clerks in his office, who cost more a year than the entire claims commission.

Mr. HOLMAN. But would not other departments have to have that additional number of clerks?

Mr. WHEELER. No; we propose to take that number away from this department.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I think the gentleman is mistaken in saying that the Commissary-General said he would be able to spare thirty clerks.

Mr. WHEELER. I am told all around that I am mistaken, and perhaps I am.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I think the number he said he could spare was fifteen, and not thirty.

Mr. BECK. I supposed, when my amendment was offered to refer these claims to the Court of Claims, that there were no gentlemen, on this side of the House at least, who would object to it. I am sorry to find that I am mistaken. Sir, no man more earnestly desires the honest payment of all claims against the Government than I do, and no man would be further from placing any obstacle in the way of any honest claimant; but all the money that goes into the hands of the Commissary-General and the Quartermaster-General, or indeed into the hands of any official, belongs, of course, to the people of the United States, and is the proceeds of the sale of their property, or of taxation imposed upon them in some form or other. I know of no other way by which officials can obtain money for any purpose. When it gets into their hands as executive officers of the Government, it ought to go into the Treasury of the United States. And when there, it ought to be taken out only by an appropriation made by Congress, or on the judgment of a court. That is the proposition which is submitted by the Committee on Appropriations and by the substitute that I offer, the only difference between the two being as to the court that should dispose of it. The judicial power of the United States was established to determine questions of right, and it is a perversion of the functions of Government to take that power from the courts and transfer it to the executive officers of the Government.

The report of the Quartermaster-General, made eighteen months ago, shows, as I read the other day, that the total amount received since June 30, 1865, by the Quartermaster-General's Department in excess of all appropriations is $107,900,000. All this, except $2,000,000, has been used in payment of the indebtedness of that department. Ought that to be so? Ought the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General be allowed to dispose of over $100,000,000 of the proceeds of sale of the property of the people of the United States without any judicial tribunal supervising his action, or without Congress having any authority over him? By no means.

I was amazed when I heard the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] speak of my proposition, or that of the Committee on Appropriations, being against the interests of his people, or being against the interest of any honest claimant. Can it be unjust to require a claimant to go before a court and present his proof before judges sworn to do justice without sale, denial, or delay? Why, sir, to-day, in these departments of the Government, after a claim has been proved to be just, all that an outsider has to do, who thinks he can make something by objecting to it, is to go there and say, "This claimant is disloyal." When that is done, the claimant cannot learn either who made the charge or what the facts are which are charged against him. That statement remains there, kept a secret from the claimant or his attorney, and the claim is tied up until perhaps the very man who falsely put that statement there, after he has managed to get a contract from the claimant to pay him half of the claim, removes the objection, and then the claimant gets one-half and the interloper the other.

It is said that many of these claims are rejected. Yes, thousands of them are rejected, and most of them will be rejected if the swarms of lobbyists hanging around this Capitol, who make a living by plundering honest claimants, are not satisfied. They file statements against claimants and objections to claims secretly in the Departments, and under the rules of the Departments the claimants cannot know what those statements are, and cannot have their claims passed until the lobby rings are satisfied.

I want claimants to have the right to go before the courts of the country, where sneaks and thieves cannot intervene without the risk of serving a term in the penitentiary; where the United States will be represented; where the claimants, represented by counsel openly and honestly employed to see that justice is done, can be heard; and where villainy can be openly exposed; and then let the Commissary-General and the Quartermaster-General, as they will have the right and as it will be their duty to do, bring into open court their books, their papers, and their evidence, which will be open alike to the citizen and the Government; then, and then only, truth and justice will prevail, and influence will not supersede the law.

Gentlemen seem to think that we are trying to deprive the Government of the right of having these officers tell what they know. No such thing; they can bring all their books, papers, and vouchers before the court, and if the United States is about to be defrauded by dishonest claimants, they can appear there as witnesses and prevent the perpetration of wrong. But, no; these officers are to be continued as absolute judges in order to favor their friends and reject all claims of men who do not employ their pets. I do not care how honest your Quartermaster-General or other officers may be. The clerks in their departments, many of them picked up on the streets because they are politicians or the friends of politicians, without legal knowledge or qualifications as judges, will enter into the combinations with the rings of lobbyists swarming around the Capitol, and the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General and claim ants are alike deceived and robbed. This is no fancy sketch; every claimant, every honest agent and attorney, knows that it is true. The officers of the Government, the members of Congress, know it; and the sooner it is stopped the better it will be for all honest officials.

What, I ask again, became of this $105,000,000 that was expended by the Quartermaster-General's Department? Who knows how much of it stuck to the hands of the claim agents around this city? An investigation of what became of this $105,000,000 would, I have no doubt, develop the fact that more than one-half of it never reached the men to whom it was due; and even the Quartermaster-General could not control the frauds, however earnestly he may have desired to do so. These claim agents circulate all over the country, from one end to the other. They allege that the reason they have to charge one-half or three-fourths of the value of the claim in order to get it allowed is because they have to buy clerks in the Departments, and officers, and members of Congress. They are everywhere slandering and bringing into disrepute all who are connected either with the payment of these claims or the legislation under which their payment is provided for.

It is because I desire to break up this system and put it out of the power of bad men to defame the men who are intrusted with the management of public affairs that I ask that these claims may go before a court, where all the facts will appear, and where all the evidence will be seen, and where no sneak-thief can stop a claim until he can subsidize the man to whom it is due, and thus obtain the lion's share of it. I suppose there is not a lobby agent around this Capitol now who is not opposed to this proposition and is not working to defeat it with all his might, by every influence he can bring to bear on every member of this House who can be approached by him or his friends.

I introduced last year, and almost passed through the House, and I have referred it again to the Committee on the Judiciary, a bill regulating the payment and employment of agents and attorneys before Congress and the Departments. I want them when they come before Congress, before our committees, or any Department of the Government, to file their contract with the man who employs them, and to appear as counsel, and not be sneaking around pretending to have influence here and there with the men who have to pass upon claims, surrounding a claimant the moment he appears with his claim, and secretly filing all sorts of charges against him until they have robbed and plundered him.

Mr. HEREFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman if these claim agents whom he speaks of, would not go before the Court of Claims?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; or if they do, they will be exposed. Men will then go as lawyers or agents who present claims honorably.

Mr. WHEELER. One word in relation to what has fallen from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in the matter of these claims. During the progress of this bill I have received anonymous communications which I have thrown into my waste-basket, filled with threats to me, some to the effect that if I had any scheme of legislation, or bill in which I was interested, I must look out for the fate of it when reached if I pressed this portion of the Army bill through the House.

I do not wish to stigmatize these claim agents as all dishonest men. There are honorable exceptions. There are most excellent men in this city who are legitimately employed as claim agents, and who are as honest as any men in the profession. But there are those who are a disgrace to humanity; and that class swarm into these departments as the flies of old swarmed into the houses of the Egyptians. They are robbing these claimants, taking frequently half or two-thirds of all that is recovered from the Government. The best service that the Judiciary Committee of this House can render to the Government is to bring in here a good, strong, stringent act against champerty, and then we shall stop this business. The fact that these claims are a standing temptation to frauds upon the Government is a sufficient reason, if there were no other, why we ought to adopt such legislation as is here proposed. As I have before stated in the debate upon this bill, I have the authority of a high official in the Quartermaster's Department for saying that within the last six months one claim agent has brought in from the little State of Maryland claims of this kind to the amount of $200,000, which he is pressing with all the pertinacity which characterizes that class of men. Gentlemen of the committee, this must stop, or the Treasury of the United States must suspend payment.

There are already lodged in these different departments, and before the southern claims commission, claims against the Government to the amount of over $60,000,000. I ask gentlemen representing the Southern States here, why should there not be uniformity in the disposition of these claims? One claimant residing in a Southern State must now go before the southern claims commission and prove his claim, and when he has done so the claim must come here for revision; the claimant cannot get a dollar except by our sanction; but another claimant goes before the Quartermaster-General, gets a decision in that department, and puts his hand at once upon the money. Why this distinction? Why should not the claimants all stand upon a common footing?

Whatever may be the fate of the fourth section of this bill, wherever the House may decide that these claims should go, I say that, as a matter of public safety and of public morals, we ought to remove the temptation which exists under the present system, and carry this money back into the Treasury, where it belongs. I trust that the motion to strike out the second section will not prevail.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEREFORD to strike out the second section, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 24, noes not counted.

The CHAIRMAN. The third section has already been read, (no amendment being offered,) and also the fourth section, to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has offered an amendment.

Mr. SPEER. If the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is now before the committee, I move to amend by adding to it the following:

Provided, That all evidence taken in reference to these claims and now on file with the Quartermaster-General or Commissary-General shall be transferred to the said court, and shall be used there as if taken under the rules of said court.

Mr. BECK. I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to say a word upon this proposition. I desire, and I have no doubt this House desires, two things: first, that claimants against the Government shall have an honest, fair, and speedy hearing; secondly, that the interests of the Government shall be properly and duly protected. Now it must strike every man that, from the very magnitude of these claims they should not be intrusted for disposition and determination to any clerk. These clerks are without either personal, official, or judicial responsibility in this matter. Many of them are entirely without proper qualifications for the discharge of such a duty as this. Why should we cast upon men who have been selected for the discharge of no such duties the determination of questions involving millions and millions of dollars?

It is admitted that this should not be done; but it is claimed that the law having been in force for so many years, claimants have simply obeyed the law, have gone before the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General and presented their claims at great cost of time, trouble, and money in furnishing proof; and that it is unjust at this late day to change the tribunal. Now this amendment reaches just that objection. I admit the force of the objection. I say that the Government having invited these claimants to go with their evidence before the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General, it would hardly be treating them with fairness, when they have gone where we have sent them, to take away now the jurisdiction of that tribunal and require proceedings to be begun anew.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the gentleman, in speaking on this question, recollect the proviso I gave notice I designed to offer as an amendment to the fourth section?

Mr. SPEER. No, sir.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me read it to the gentleman.

Mr. SPEER. I am speaking with reference to the amendment I have offered myself.

Mr. WHEELER. I gave notice that I intended to offer the following as an amendment to the fourth section:

Provided, That all such claims now pending and undetermined in the Department of the Quartermaster-General and the Department of the Commissary-General of Subsistence shall, on the passage of this act, be transferred to the said commissioners of claims; and such transfer shall be regarded as presentation within the meaning of this act.

Mr. SPEER. I have offered an amendment broader in its terms than that of the gentleman.

Now I say that these claimants, having gone where the law directed them to go, it would hardly be treating them fairly, at this late day, to turn them out of court, when, perhaps, it may be no longer possible to obtain new proof.

What does my amendment propose? It provides that the evidence which they have taken and which is now on file shall be transferred with the transfer of the claims, and be used in the court to which the claims are transferred. Is not that fair and right? Why turn these claimants out of court? Why strike dead by a congressional act the evidence which by the law is now living and in force, and which, if the law were not changed, would be perhaps sufficient to secure the allowance of their claims? These claimants are certainly not to be presumed to be thieves or robbers. The presumption is that they have honest claims. They have gone to the tribunals to which the law sent them; and now if we turn them away from that tribunal, we should make proper provision for the protection of their rights.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Why would not the evidence which is competent before the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General be equally competent before the claims commissioners, to whom it is proposed to transfer the duty of deciding upon these claims?

Mr. SPEER. I will answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Many affidavits and depositions and proofs are on file there now which are competent testimony under the regulations of the Commissary-General's and the Quartermaster-General's Departments. If these claims be removed to another tribunal affidavits could not be retaken. Perhaps the parties who made them are dead, or have removed to distant States and their whereabouts are unknown; and yet in the Court of Claims, and under the rules prevailing in that court, those affidavits and depositions which are on file in the War Department, and which are competent under the regulations of the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General, would not be receivable or admissible.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania he would, by his amendment, legalize before the Court of Claims evidence, however illegal it may be, which happens to be on file with the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General. I hope he will modify it so it will provide for evidence legally taken. If the amendments are read, the committee will see precisely to what I refer.

Mr. SPEER. I want it to express this: whatever is competent evidence under the regulations of the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General shall be competent evidence before the Court of Claims.

The amendments were again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. However illegaly evidence may have been taken which is now on file in either of these Departments, this amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania legalizes it before the Court of Claims.

Mr. SPEER. I only propose to include evidence admissible under the regulations of those two departments.

Mr. WHEELER. That improves it very much.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think there is no objection to the gentleman's amendment, if he will modify it to cover the objection I have stated.

Mr. HURLBUT. Does the gentleman allow the evidence to be open to legal exceptions?

Mr. SPEER. That would destroy the purpose of my amendment. You change the tribunal to which these claims are to go, taking them from the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General and sending them before the Court of Claims, which has different rules. Unless some such amendment as that I have suggested be adopted, we will do great injustice to these claimants. It would be utterly impossible to retake this evidence in many cases. Many of the witnesses are dead, or they have gone from one State to another, and their whereabouts are unknown. It would amount really to a denial of justice to compel claimants to retake all this testimony.

Mr. HEREFORD. The whole of the testimony in the departments is entirely ex parte.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to a matter of detail in his amendment.

Mr. SPEER. Read my amendment as it is modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, All evidence admissible under the rules and regulations of the departments in reference to these claims, and now on file with the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General, shall be transferred to said court, and shall be used there as if taken under the rules of said court.

Mr. SPEER. I hope there will be no objection to that amendment. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky accepts it.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection whatever to accept it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky provides, when the person is a minor or a feme-covert, or laboring under legal disability, the claim may be presented within one year after the removal of the disability. That is just so far as minors are concerned, but as married women are able to sue in their own names in almost all of the States in the Union, it is hardly fair to the Government to postpone in the case of married women when it may be half a century before the disability is removed. I suggest to the gentleman to strike out the words "feme-covert, or under other legal disability," and insert "persons under guardianship."

Mr. BECK. That would be an improvement, and I accept the gentleman's modification. I did not pretend to draw the amendment so as to cover accurately every particular. I am willing to modify it whenever it may be necessary to accomplish the object I have in view.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. So far as I am concerned, and so far as it concerns the district in Tennessee which I have the honor to represent upon this floor, I would much prefer Congress should pass a resolution declaring they would not pay a dollar of any of these claims. I would rather they would be honest and candid and say they do not propose to pay loyal claimants coming within the provisions of the act of 1864 than to do the same thing indirectly by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There are seventeen thousand claims pending before these claims commissioners.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman does not surely mean my amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

There are six thousand pending before the Quartermaster-General; making twenty-three thousand claims. This amendment proposes to send those claims to the Court of Claims. Now, if you send all those claims to the Court of Claims, with the twenty thousand more that will be filed under the law extending the time, when will all those claims be heard; when will the end be? It is now ten years since the Government got the horses, the mules, the corn, &c., of the people of the Southern States; and it is not proposed to pay interest on any of the claims. But now at the end of ten years the proposition comes up to send twenty-three thousand claims to the Court of Claims, which sits during six months in a year and adjudicates perhaps five hundred claims. The figures are as I state them; and that is the proposition of this patriotic Congress to pay the southern people for their quartermaster and commissary supplies that were taken ten, eleven, and twelve years ago.

So far as I am concerned, I believe the law as it now stands is the best. If these claims go to the claims commission they will be passed upon as they have passed upon those already adjudicated. In passing upon five thousand claims they rejected three thousand and cut down the two thousand allowed to two-thirds or perhaps one-half of what ought to be granted. The Quartermaster-General, when he passes upon a claim, I am proud to say, does justice to the claimant, and, I believe, also to the Government. If the claim is for a horse, he adjudicates payment for the value of that horse. If for corn or any quartermaster's supplies, he pays what they were worth at the time and at the place where they were taken.

I am opposed to this whole proposition. It is one which denies justice. It puts off the settlement of those claims. Talk of sending them to the Court of Claims, where there are thirty thousand claims already pending! They will never be settled in that way. I hope we will not ask those claimants to go into court now in 1874 to ask payment for supplies taken in 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865 from the loyal people of the Southern States.

Mr. FRYE. In the course of this debate reflections have occasionally been cast upon the southern claims commission in the way of complaints that they have cut down the claims that are made before them. Now they do cut down claims, and they must cut them down. For instance, the law authorizes the southern claims commission to pay for supplies furnished to the Army of the United States. Well, the Army of the United States took a man's fence, a fence all round his farm or his house, and in order to help the loyal claimant the rule of the court is that they will so consider the law as to make that fence wood. If they did not make the fence wood they could not pay the southern claimant one single dollar under the law. So they call the fence wood and allow two dollars a cord for it.

I have heard, Mr. Chairman, more complaint from claimants when I was a member of the Claims Committee—more complaint against the southern claims commission for this one thing of calling fences wood than for anything else under the sun. But the southern claims commission could not allow a dollar in such a case, except under that construction.

Again, they are compelled to find the loyalty of the claimant. Now humanity is weak everywhere, and it is just as weak South as it is North. The experience of the commission shows that men will take the oath of God upon them and swear to their loyalty again and again, ay, thousands of times, when there was proof lying right by that they were as disloyal as almost any man could well be. Complaints arose on that ground also.

But I submit from my experience of the southern claims commission that it is one of the most careful, the most judicious, the most prompt, of all the commissions and all the courts which have been established by authority of law. I say, sir, that the chairman or the chief of that commission is a gentleman who would do no discredit to the office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. He is a man learned in the law. He is a man full of justice, full of equity. He is a man who would do right if the heavens fell. And his two associates, so far as my experience goes, are worthy of their chief. I submit, sir, that the men who have loyal claims cannot go to a court of law anywhere now constituted where their claims would receive a more prompt hearing and a fairer adjudication than they will before this same court.

Now what does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] propose to do? He proposes to abolish this commission at once, with all its machinery, with all its experience, with all its rules. He proposes to abolish the southern claims commission, and put in its place the Court of Claims.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman will allow me just one word, I will say that my amendment expressly reserves and avoids interfering with all the claims now pending before the southern claims commission.

Mr. FRYE. Does it not interfere with claims that will hereafter arise?

Mr. BECK. No other claim can be presented before that commission, because all are barred under the law now. No new claim can now be presented.

Mr. FRYE. It provides that subsequent to this all claims of loyal southerners shall go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; it transfers them from the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments to the Court of Claims.

Mr. FRYE. The southern claims commission has found it absolutely necessary, in order to preserve the United States against these perjured claimants, that investigations shall be made all over the South, and they have officers on purpose to do the work; but as I understand this amendment, if passed, it would be taking away that security, and would refer claims hereafter arising to the Court of Claims, which could have no such power; they would not have the experience either; and beside that, sir, they have more to do now than they can possibly do. I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] who stated, as I read in the RECORD, that the Court of Claims was a court without legal knowledge—an ex parte court. I do not find that to be true at all. The chief justice of that court is a fine lawyer, and I know Judge Loring is a fine lawyer; and I know that it is not an ex parte court.

Mr. KASSON. As the gentleman has referred to me, he will allow me to say that he has stated what I said a little more broadly than I stated it myself. But I wish even to take back so much as what I did say. I was in error. There have been changes made in the constitution of the court since I was formerly acquainted with it. Its jurisdiction has been enlarged and its character elevated, and I wish to stand upon the record as not having said anything in its derogation.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to say further, that when I read this appropriation bill these sections, 2, 3, and 4, commended themselves to me from my experience of the claims commission more than any part of this bill of appropriations. It seems to me that it is the true and proper thing for the Congress of the United States to do, and to do it quickly too.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] which, I understand, is necessary to enable me to say a few words. I wish to concur very largely with what has been said by the gentleman who has just addressed the House, and also in most that was said by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] But it seems to me that it is very clear that for this particular class of claims the southern claims commission, as at present organized, is a better tribunal than the Court of Claims. It has certainly this advantage, that you have there one system applicable to all classes of claims of this description. The Court of Claims has not now jurisdiction over cases of claims for supplies furnished to the Army during the war, and why that court should have jurisdiction over cases hereafter presented, if any there can be, from the Southern States or from the Northern States, or the States not in the rebellion, or from Tennessee and one or two counties in West Virginia, and leave the jurisdiction of similar claims from the States in rebellion in another tribunal, I do not see.

I propose to offer as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky a provision to increase the number of the southern claims commission, with two objects. One is to obviate the objection that the number of claims is so great that it will prevent their disposing of them within a reasonable time, and the second is to obviate the objection that has been raised, that if you send northern claims to the southern claims commission they will be postponed to the cases already pending in that tribunal.

I ask that the amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And there shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional commissioners of claims, with the powers, duties, and compensation of the commissioners created under the act of March 3, 1871, and who shall devote their time exclusively to the claims transferred to the commission by the provisions of this act. The decision of the two additional commissioners shall be taken and held to be the decision of the commissioners, unless in the case of disagreement by the two, when the decision of the presiding commissioner shall be given, and shall be decisive.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I suppose that amendment is not in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, while there are two amendments pending.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I so understood, but I wished it read for information, so that if the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky should be rejected, this amendment might be added to the bill reported by the committee; and I understand the gentleman who has charge of the bill will be willing to accept the amendment.

But I wish to say in this matter of sending the claims from the department to a tribunal like this of the southern claims commission, with this addition of force, that I have had conversations with those gentlemen, which have made me believe that this is the greatest measure of economy that has been presented to this Congress; that there is more protection to the Treasury of the United States in this fourth section than in anything that we have done so far this session.

I wish to say to this committee that these claims, the meritorious and honest part of them, were for the most part presented early after the organization of the commission, and presented early to the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General. The southern claims commission find as they go on that the merits of the claims deteriorate, and the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General generally find the same; that the proportion of claims that are found to be just and meritorious and not fraudulent diminish year by year. Last year the commission allowed but between 7 and 8 per cent. of the claims which they passed upon; and the reason was, that what is now the great mass of claims that come before them, although they may include some honest claims which have been deferred or postponed for some reason, are substantially the rakings and scrapings and inventions of claim agents. It is time that these claims should be examined by a tribunal where the United States can be represented by counsel and agents.

Mr. BECK. Is there not trouble in this, that under the law organizing the southern claims commission they are first limited to certain States, and this section extends their jurisdiction over the other States of course?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It does extend it.

Mr. BECK. Is there not difficulty in their not having power to send for papers in the Departments?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. No, sir; they have that power.

Mr. BECK. I am not familiar with the organization of that commission.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. They have every necessary power. The United States is represented. The commission has power to take testimony, to bring before them all the papers of the Departments, and they are most laboriously and faithfully, and as I believe justly, administering justice to claimants and protecting the interests and the Treasury of the United States. And with the amendment which I propose, the addition of two judges, who are to devote themselves exclusively to the additional cases which are hereby sent to them, they can proceed without any delay to adjudicate on these cases, availing themselves of all the agencies of this commission, and be able to do the work more rapidly and more thoroughly than the work will be done if the claims should remain in the Quartermaster-General's and Commissary-General's Departments.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to state one objection that I have to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] and only one. It is, that as we have a Court of Claims established as a legal court, and as the southern claims commission has no longer power to take charge of new cases, and there is a very large number of claims now pending before it, does not the gentleman from Massachusetts think it would be better to send all these claims to a regularly established court than to keep the commission running, and to extend it?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I think the Court of Claims cannot be enlarged judiciously in its operations. I think that the Court of Claims is not so likely to get through its present docket as is the southern claims commission; that it will postpone the speedy decision of these claims to refer them to the Court of Claims. But with the addition of the two commissioners, with the experience the commission has acquired in the consideration of the cases of a similar character heretofore referred to them, the claims commission is the best tribunal to which these claims can be referred.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] has struck the happy solution of this difficulty. I certainly prefer, and I think my associates on the Committee on Appropriations with whom I have conferred prefer, his proposition to that of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] I ask that the Clerk now read, for the information of the committee, this section as it would stand by the adoption of the amendment I have moved and the one proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That all claims of citizens who remained loyal adherents to the cause and Government of the United States during the war for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States, and for the use or loss of vessels or boats while employed in the military service of the United States, including any such claims now pending and undetermined in any department of the Government, shall be presented, before the 1st day of November, 1874, to the commissioners of claims created by act of March 3, 1871, who shall have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine the same: Provided, That all such claims now pending and undetermined in the department of the Quartermaster-General and the department of the Commissary-General of Subsistence shall, on the passage of this act, be transferred to the said commissioners of claims, and such transfer shall be regarded as presentation within the meaning of this act. And all such claims which shall not be presented to said commissioners on or before said day shall be barred, and shall not be entertained without further authority of Congress: Provided, That nothing herein shall be deemed to affect or impair the limitation for the time for the presentation of petitions prescribed by section 2 of the act of March 3, 1873. Such commissioners shall, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1871, and the acts in amendment thereof, receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims as shall be brought before them, and shall make report of their proceedings, and of each claim considered by them, at the commencement of each session of Congress to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration. And there shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional commissioners of claims, with the powers, duties, and compensation of the commissioners created under the act of March 3, 1871, and who shall devote their time exclusively to the claims transferred to the commission by the provisions of this act; and the decision of the said two additional commissioners thereon shall be taken and held to be the decision of the commission, unless in the case of disagreement of the two, when the decision of the presiding commissioner shall be given and shall be final.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] for section 4 as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That all claims of citizens not now pending before the southern claims commission who remained loyal adherents to the cause of the Government of the United States, for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion, for the use of the Army of the United States, and for the use or loss of vessels or boats while employed in the military or naval service of the United States, including any such claims now pending and not finally disposed of in any department of the Government, shall be presented, within one year from the passage of this act, to the United States Court of Claims, which court shall have jurisdiction of the same; and all such claims which shall not be presented within the time herein specified shall be barred and shall not be entertained, without further authority of Congress: Provided, That where the claimant is a minor, insane person, or under guardianship at the time of the passage of this act, then every such person shall have one year and no more from the date of the removal of such legal disability in which to present such petition: Provided further, That all evidence taken in reference to these claims and now on file with the Quartermaster-General or Commissary-General, and admissible under the rules and regulations of their departments, shall be transferred to the said Court of Claims, and shall be there considered as if taken under the rules of the said court.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. COTTON. Is it not in order to perfect the text of the section before voting on a substitute?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Is debate exhausted upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Is it not in order to move to strike out any portion of that amendment, so that I may say a few words?

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr.

E. R. HOAR] withdraws his amendment, no further amendment is in order.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I withdraw my amendment, if the gentleman from Virginia will renew it.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I renew the amendment. Representing in this House a southern constituency, I wish to say that in my opinion the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, if it be adopted, will simply have the effect of practically deferring forever every claim of this class that has not been already paid. We might just as well adopt a proposition to confiscate all these claims as deprive the claimants of any possible chance to obtain a hearing before any tribunal. I certainly hope the amendment will not be adopted.

As one member who has had large experience in business before the southern claims commission, I wish to add my testimony as to the manner in which those commissioners have performed the delicate, difficult, and arduous duties imposed upon them. I do not believe that since the foundation of the Government there has been any tribunal before which cases have been more patiently and more honestly heard and determined than by the gentlemen constituting the southern claims commission. Though I have had occasion at times to complain of some decisions they have made affecting constituents of mine having claims before that commission, I wish to say that in the main, so far as I know, their decisions have been fair and just; and they have exercised a very careful guardianship over the interests of the Government confided to their care. I think we cannot do a better thing than extend their jurisdiction, and increase the number of which the commission now consists. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] may not prevail, but that the one offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] may be adopted.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me call the attention of the Chair and of the committee to the parliamentary status of this question. The motion to amend the fourth section takes precedence, of course, of a motion to strike out. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has moved to strike out and insert. The first motion to be voted upon, as I understand, is that made by me to add a proviso. The next question will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR;] and after that shall have been voted upon, then will come up for action the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to strike out the section and insert the provision he offers.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to entertain an amendment of this character upon an appropriation bill. This is simply an appropriation bill, and the section under consideration was introduced by special leave of the House. That section having been thus introduced, is it competent on an appropriation bill to introduce other and independent legislation?

Mr. WHEELER. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that after this proposition has been debated half an hour or more, the gentleman's point comes too late.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I happened to be in my committee-room during that time.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman ought to remain here. The rules are made upon the assumption that gentlemen remain in the Hall unless they have special leave to withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes altogether too late. The Chair decides that the amendments to the fourth section designed to perfect it are first to be voted upon. Therefore the question will be taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from New York is offered as an independent amendment; and no amendment to it is pending. I desire to offer an amendment which is appropriate as an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. There are two amendments pending to the section. Another is not admissible. The amendment offered by myself, and that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] must be out of the way before another amendment can be entertained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to be pending.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I renewed the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I wish to have a distinct understanding with regard to the position of the question. I understood the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] having the bill in charge, to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly I do.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then there was read at the Clerk's desk not only the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts but the remainder of the section, and also the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Now I ask, and I believe I have the right to ask, that a vote be taken separately upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, so that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York may come up as a separate question.

Mr. WHEELER. That is exactly what I am asking for. The parliamentary question first recurs on the amendment offered by myself, and afterward on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] is an amendment offered to the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and is in order when it is reached.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending, and when they are disposed of the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.] The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] which is as follows.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10 of the bill, in line 12, after the word "same" insert these words:

Provided, That all such claims now pending and undetermined in the Department of the Quartermaster-General, and the Department of the Commissary-General of Subsistence, shall, on the passage of this act, be transferred to said commissioners of claims, and such transfer shall be regarded as presentation within the meaning of this act.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Is an amendment to that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, as there are two amendments already pending.

The question was taken on Mr. WHEELER's amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Is my amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The question next recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] and it will be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 12, after the word "same," these words:

And there shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional commissioners of claims, with the powers, duties, and compensation of the commissioners created under the act of March 3, 1871, and who shall devote their time exclusively to the claims transferred to the commission by the provisions of this act; and the decision of such two additional commissioners thereon shall be taken and held to be the decision of the commission, unless in case of disagreement of the two, when the decision of the presiding commissioner shall be given, and shall be decisive.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts his amendment should come in at the end of the amendment of the gentleman from New York which has just been adopted. As the amendment was read, it provides that it shall come in after the word "same" in line 12. The amendment of the gentleman from New York has already been inserted in that place. Let the amendment come in at the close of the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will come in at the place suggested by the gentleman from Ohio. It must come in there and cannot come in at any other place.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. E. R. HOAR, and it was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to add to the section what I send to the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That all claims of citizens of the United States for stores or supplies, purchased by any duly authorized officer or agent of the United States for the use of the Army thereof, as evidenced by receipts in writing given by such duly authorized officer or agent, shall be considered and allowed without proof of the loyalty of such claimant.

Mr. WHEELER. I make the point of order that is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the amendment cannot be received.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I offer the following amendment——

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia is read, I suggest the gentleman from New York modify the language of his amendment so as not to use the words "Quartermaster-General's Department and Commissary-General's Department."

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I believe I have the floor, and ask that my amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, section 4, line 1, after the word "claim," insert "not already in process of examination by the Quartermaster-General's or Commissary-General's Department."

On page 10, line 9, strike out "seventy-four" and insert "seventy-five."

Mr. WHEELER. That is all wrong.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I only desire those cases in process of examination may remain in the departments, where parties have gone to the expense of coming here with witnesses. Otherwise they will be deprived of the benefit of what they have already done, and will have to go over the same ground again.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman has mistaken the purport of the proviso adopted by the committee in reference to claimants just ready for payment, and I wish the gentleman to bear in mind it will be three months before these claims will reach the Auditor's office, where they will be stayed by the provisions of this act.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I hope a limitation will be put in this bill.

Mr. WHEELER. We have now until next November, and all claims now filed there are to be regarded as presented. The papers are to be turned over to the commissioners of claims, and this is regarded as a presentation.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I am willing to support the gentleman's amendment if he will only allow those cases where no evidence at all has been taken to remain where they are for settlement.

Mr. WHEELER. Every petition in every case that will be turned over, under the provisions of this law, to the claims commission will be treated as a presentation of the claim.

Mr. THORNBURGH. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. YOUNG] has submitted two distinct propositions. I ask whether a separate vote cannot be allowed on the two propositions?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I am willing to have a separate vote, and should decidedly prefer that course. I ask that the first portion of my amendment be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1 of section 4, after the word "claims," insert the following: "not already in process of examination by the Quartermaster's and Commissary's Departments;" so that it will read:

That all claims, not already in process of examination by the Quartermaster's and Commissary's Departments, of citizens who remained loyal adherents to the cause of the Government of the United States, &c.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is in order at present.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, it was not agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Now, sir, I ask that my other amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 9, strike out "1874" and insert "1875;" so that it will read:

Shall be presented before the 1st day of November, 1875, to the commissioners of claims created by the act of March 3, 1871, who shall have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine the same.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. This gives one more year to those claimants to file their claims before the commission.

The question being put, there were—ayes 70, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. YOUNG of Georgia, and Mr. WHEELER, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. I offer the following as an amendment to the section as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the section the following:

And all the evidence taken in reference to the said claims, and now on file in the office of the Quartermaster-General or Commissary-General, shall be transferred with the claims and be considered by the commissioners as if taken under the rules and regulations of said commission.

Mr. SPEER. I desire simply to say a word, that the House may understand the effect of my amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from New York merely transfers to the commissioners the papers and evidence on file with the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General.

Mr. WHEELER. It does not give them any effect as evidence, I admit.

Mr. SPEER. It simply transfers these papers. My amendment provides that all evidence on file with either the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General, and admissible under the law and the rules and regulations prevailing at the time it was filed, shall be transferred to the court composed of these commissioners, and shall be considered by them. Is not that right and fair? If you change the court, you place it beyond the power of many of these parties whose witnesses were living at the time their claims were filed and their evidence furnished to refurnish that evidence. The witnesses are dead, many of them; many of them have gone to parts unknown; it would be simply a denial of justice, on the part of Congress, to worthy claimants to refuse this. I ask that my amendment be again read, that the committee may understand the full effect of it.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I make the point of order that this is new legislation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. As the gentleman's amendment now stands it would take all the evidence in the departments and make it admissible.

Mr. SPEER. It merely takes the evidence admissible under the rules and regulations of the departments. If those words are not in the amendment I ask the Clerk to insert them.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I insist on my point of order, that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the amendment is in order. It is germane to a section which was made in order by the House.

Mr. WHEELER. With a proper modification I would be willing to accept it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will wait a moment until the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] is perfected.

Mr. SPEER. I ask the Clerk to read my amendment as it now stands.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following:

And all evidence taken in reference to said claimants and now on file in the office of the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General, and admissible under the rules and regulations of their departments, shall be transferred with the claims and be considered by the commissioners as if taken under the rules and regulations of said commission.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to strike out the words "as if taken" and to substitute for them the words "so far as it would be competent."

It seems to me that there is a fault in the language of the amendment now offered. It may very fairly be considered, consistently with its language, to mean that if a mere affidavit of the parties is competent in the department, and has been taken, it shall be transferred and received by the court as competent, and perhaps as persuasive or conclusive there. Now what I think the committee desires to accomplish, at any rate what I think the committee will consider just, is this, that a man who has already taken evidence before the department, which, under the rules of law administered in this court, is competent and proper, shall not lose the benefit of his diligence in taking that testimony heretofore by the transfer; shall not be compelled to take it over again because he did not take it in accordance with the rules of the department, although it may be still competent evidence in the court.

Now, the exact effect of the amendment, with my amendment, will be this: that the court to which these claims are transferred will be required to apply its own rules of evidence, which are the rules of a court, to the claims, and that the method of dealing with the evidence, if taken according to a method correct in the department where the case then was, cannot be changed with regard to evidence previously taken.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] evidently mistakes the effect of my amendment. It is not that the evidence now on file shall be sufficient or shall control the determination of the court when brought before the commissioners, but that the evidence on file shall be considered by the commissioners. What weight shall be given to it will be for them to determine under all the circumstances. It will simply prevent its being excluded on technical objections—the objection, for instance, that it had not been taken according to the rules of the commission, or that it had not been taken on proper notice, or before the proper officer, or anything of that kind. They are to consider it and give it what effect it is entitled to, and that they shall not be permitted to exclude it because of some irregularities.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The difference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself is exactly this: I do not desire that a mere unsupported affidavit of the party shall be considered by the court to which these cases are removed.

Mr. SPEER. Then you are changing the rules of evidence.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It might be considered in the department now, because there is no limit to their discretion. My amendment allows evidence competent according to the rules administered in courts to be received, although it was not taken according to the methods usual in courts.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SPEER. I will withdraw my amendment, to allow the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot withdraw his amendment when there is an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment temporarily.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I renew it. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the object of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is more in the line of what the Committee on Appropriations and this committee are attempting to do than anything to the contrary. It is not proposed in any transfer that he who goes from the Quartermaster's Department or the Commissary Department to the southern claims commission shall go with any impediment, but that he shall have the benefit of all that he has done there. Now, whatever he has done there has been done under certain rules, and so far as he has done it it is operative upon that tribunal, and may result in the payment of his claim. If you transfer him to another tribunal that by another set of rules excludes all of that testimony and will not hear or receive it, you as effectually bar him as though you declared he should not go further. Is not that true?

Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks this: There is undoubtedly a large mass of matter before these Bureaus in the War Department good for nothing and already rejected by them; that he does not ask to transfer, but that whatever is there that is good in the making out of his claim so as to entitle him to payment shall go to the southern claims commission for their consideration. It meets there with an infirmity which cannot, of course, be changed, for that commission is proceeding under rules that prevent this evidence from receiving the same comparative weight with the new commission that it did in the Bureau. That is an infirmity which the gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot cure, and which the claimant must stand. But it seems to me clear that when you send him there you should give him as admissible testimony what he has put in before the Bureau; otherwise you exclude him entirely, because he has put in before the Bureau only what they require; he might have had there more testimony had they required more, but sufficient unto him has been the evil or the good thereof; he has rested his case on what they require. His other testimony has gone the way of all earthly things; he cannot produce it, and his case rests on what there was in the Bureau.

I think, therefore, for these reasons the gentleman from Pennsylvania is right; and although I am almost always glad to agree in the points presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who seems to be one of the best and the acutest lawyers here, I have made up my mind that he is wrong in this matter.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I had made up my mind to withdraw my amendment, and I think the gentleman from Maine is right. I now withdraw it, and I ask the House to listen to an amendment which has been proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES,] and is in these words:

And all evidence in the form required by said departments in reference to said claims, and now on file, if competent under the rules of said commission, shall be considered in the determination of said claims.

Mr. SPEER. That is simply what my amendment provides for.

Mr. BECK. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is this: after this amendment has been perfected, will a vote be taken upon the amendment which I offered as a substitute for it?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, unless the gentleman withdraws it.

Mr. BECK. I do not intend to do so.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. SPEER, and it was adopted.

Mr. BECK. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope not; I hope we shall dispose of the bill this evening.

Mr. BECK. I will state the reason why I made the motion. I desire before the vote is taken on my substitute that the House and the Committee on Appropriations should have an opportunity of looking at the section as it now stands. So many amendments have been adopted that I do not know how it stands.

Mr. WHEELER. Let us report the amendment to-night and vote on it to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. I do not want a vote taken on my substitute to-night. I think the committee ought to know more about the present condition of the section.

Mr. WHEELER. The amendments adopted have all been in the line of the section reported by the committee.

Mr. SENER. I make the point of order that a motion that the committee rise is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken if the gentleman from Kentucky insists on his motion.

Mr. BECK. I do, in order to test the sense of the committee.

The question was put on Mr. BECK'S motion; and, on a division, there were—ayes 60, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That all claims which have been passed upon by the Quartermaster or Commissary-General, and are still unpaid, or that have been proceeded with so far in their investigation as to be ready for decision, shall not be included in this transfer, but shall be decided and paid by the officers before whom they are now pending, and a sufficient sum shall be retained out of the moneys in this bill covered back into the Treasury to settle said claims.

Mr. WHEELER. I make the point of order that that amendment is new legislation, and is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the amendment is not before the committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is it in order now to move to strike out the section?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is already pending.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to say a word in reference to that motion. I hope this section will now be stricken out, and I desire to present to the committee some reasons in favor of striking it out.

The CHAIRMAN. What motion did the gentleman make?

Mr. LAWRENCE. To strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order; it is already pending and has been debated.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, I can debate it.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; debate is ended on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

The Clerk read as follows:

That all claims of citizens, not now pending before the southern claims commission, who remained loyal adherents to the cause of the Government of the United States, for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States, and for the use or loss of vessels or boats while employed in the military or naval service of the United States, including any such claims now pending and not finally disposed of in any Department of the Government, shall be presented within one year from the passage of this act to the United States Court of Claims, which court shall have jurisdiction of the same; and all such claims which shall not be presented within the time herein specified shall be barred, and shall not be entertained without further authority of Congress: Provided, That where the claimant is a minor, or insane person under guardianship at the time of the passage of this act, then every such person shall have one year and no more from the date of the removal of such legal disability in which to present such petition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will next report the amendment offered to the substitute by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That all evidence taken in reference to these claims and now on file with the Quartermaster-General or Commissary-General, and admissible under the rules and regulations of their departments, shall be transferred to the said Court of Claims, and shall be there considered as if taken under the rules of said court.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move that the committee do now rise, and, if I can be allowed to do so, I will now say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope the committee will not rise,

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. LAWRENCE; and on a division there were—ayes 48, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment to the substitute.

Mr. SPEER. I thought the amendment was accepted.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asked me if I would accept his amendment, which is the same one that has already been adopted to the original section. I told him that I would do so if I had the power. Of course, if I can accept it I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to accept it, and the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a part of the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I call for tellers on agreeing to the substitute.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHEELER and Mr. BECK were appointed.

The committee proceeded to divide; but before any vote was announced,

Mr. BECK said: The amendment is evidently lost, and I withdraw the call for tellers.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to put the motion, and announced that it was agreed to.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. If I have any rights on this floor I should like to have that fact determined; if I have not I also wish the question determined. The Speaker stated to the House the other day that no committee could rise and report a bill back as long as any gentleman saw fit to offer an amendment to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized if he has an amendment to offer.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I have been addressing the Chair because I desired to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. In the confusion that prevails in the committee the Chair did not hear the gentleman, but is very happy to recognize him now.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move to further amend this bill by adding the following as a new section:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of War, in the expenditure of any money appropriated by this bill, where the Pacific Railroads or any of their branches, in any case where the Government retains the amount charged for its business on account of advances made to such railroads, or either of them, come into competition with any other line of transportation, in deciding which line of transportation is the lowest bidder, shall consider all the money to be paid to said Pacific Railroads, or their branches, as so much saved to the Treasury, and govern the transportation of men and supplies accordingly.

That amendment is offered as an economical measure to be attached to this bill. It is well known that by an act of the last Congress every dollar of the interest paid by the Government of the United States to the Pacific Railroads on the bonds guaranteed by the United States is subject to be worked out by the transportation of the mails, men, and supplies for the Army, and men and supplies for the Navy; that no money is to be paid these roads for this service in any event, but that it is to be withheld to apply on the debts of the roads. Such being the law of the case, this amendment simply provides that the Quartermaster-General, in transporting troops and supplies over competing lines of railroads, shall, when one of these competing lines is a Pacific Railroad, select that Pacific Railroad as the means of transportation and thus work out a debt due the United States which will never be collected in any other way. It is a simple proposition to save so much money to the Treasury.

As an illustration, allow me to state that the Kansas Pacific and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroads are competing lines in my State, running out from Fort Leavenworth and Atchison toward the posts in the Southwest. Last year supplies and men were carried over these roads to Kit Carson, on the Kansas Pacific Railroad, and to Sargent, on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, for use in the Southwest. Both of these points are about equidistant from the forts in New Mexico, Arizona, and the Southwest. The Kansas Pacific Railroad is indebted to the United States upward of $1,300,000 on its interest advanced by the United States. I contend that it is a measure of highest economy that the troops and supplies to be transported west and southwest from Leavenworth shall go over the Kansas Pacific Railroad, instead of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad. I ask the Clerk to read a communication which I send to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of War Department indorsement, referring for report letter of the Hon. STEPHEN A. COBB, dated House of Representatives, January 16, 1874, requesting to be informed whether supplies for the Army transported westward from Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, to New Mexico, and the outposts of the Southwest, during the past season, have been carried over the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, instead of being conveyed over the line of the Kansas Pacific Railroad, &c.

In reply, I have the honor to state that, under an advertisement published about a year since, calling for proposals for wagon transportation from such shipping points on the Kansas Pacific, Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé, and Denver and Rio Grande Railroads, as should, for the interests of the service, be selected, the proposals for transportation of supplies from the western terminus of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad to the various posts in New Mexico, and from convenient points on said road to certain of the posts in the Indian Territory, was found to be the most advantageous for the United States, and contract was, with approval of the honorable Secretary of War, made accordingly. The shipping points at that time to New Mexico and Colorado were Kit Carson, on Kansas Pacific; Sargent, on Atchison and Santa Fé; and Pueblo, on Denver and Rio Grande Railroad.

Contracts were made, at the same time and with the same person for transportation of such supplies from points on the Kansas Pacific and Denver and Rio Grande Railroads as it might be found could be sent to any posts to better advantage by using those roads; but the bulk of freight was destined to posts in New Mexico, and was carried by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad.

Laws, regulations, and orders require this department to select, all things considered, the cheapest and best routes of supply, and the measures taken last year relative to transportation of supplies in the Department of the Missouri were adopted in this spirit.

The appropriation for Army transportation is chargeable with the full cost of transportation of supplies by the railroads which are indebted to the United States for bonds issued in aid of their construction. No payments are now made to said railroads, but the cost of the transportation is taken from appropriations of this department and placed in hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to be disposed of by him as the existing laws direct.

It is the effort of this department to use the indebted Pacific roads in all cases where our appropriations will not, in accomplishing the end sought, suffer by such use, and any legislation requiring an unconditional use of such roads will result, it is believed, in increased expenditures to this department and afford ground for complaint by other competing roads.

The Kansas Pacific and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroads are competing routes to New Mexico and Colorado.

The former is a road to aid in the construction of which the United States issued its bonds, and the charter of the road authorizes it to charge the United States the public tariff rates. The latter is what is known as a "land-grant" road, and for transportation over it this department pays—as in the cases of all other roads similarly chartered—but 66⅔ per cent. of its public tariff rates.

Therefore the tariff rates of both roads being equal to certain points, the United States by requiring the Kansas Pacific to be exclusively used would pay more than the transportation would cost by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad; in other words, the Government would be paying a greater price than necessary in order to enable a road to work out its debt to the prejudice of another line struggling for existence, and which was not so bountifully assisted, in its beginning, by Congress. The letter of Mr. COBB is herewith returned.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General, U. S. A.

To the honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. WHEELER. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] that the better place for his amendment is after line 24 of the first section, relating to the transportation of the Army. I do not see that the letter just read affects the question at all. The committee will see at once the impolicy of tying the Quartermaster-General down to transporting on any given line of railway. But as full answer to what has been alleged by the gentleman from Kansas, I ask that the Clerk read a letter from the Quartermaster-General, under date of February 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1874.

SIR: The following is a copy of telegram sent to you this day, namely:

"All amounts earned by Pacific Railroads are paid over by Quartermaster's Department at present to Secretary of Treasury, to be used in settling the accounts and charges against those roads on United States bonds issued to them and interest thereon. Therefore, if the Army transportation is forced over those roads under higher tariff rates, and over longer routes than it can be done over other roads, the Army transportation appropriation should be increased accordingly. These roads are not always the most direct and shortest railroad lines to the military posts, hence the amendment may compel longer routes by rail and also longer routes of wagon-haul—the most expensive transportation. All these matters are considered in making contracts, and contracts are made as the War Department finds to the best interest of the military service and of the Treasury. Mr. COBB's amendment tends to give certain roads a monopoly of the business. The amendment can do no good, may do much harm, and seems unjust to competing roads.

"M. C. MEIGS,
"Quartermaster-General."

By order Quartermaster-General.
Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. L. LUDINGTON
Quartermaster- U. S, A.

Hon. W. A. WHEELER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move to strike out the last word of my amendment, in order to have read another letter from the Quartermaster-General to the Secretary of War, and to state, in addition, that the closing words of the communication just read by the Clerk are the most extraordinary I ever knew to be uttered by an executive officer of the Army of the United States, pleading the cause of a land-grant railroad, forsooth, that he has nothing to do with, and saying that we are striking down a corporation that is struggling for existence! Now, it is a positive fact that one-half of the flowers that bloom on the prairies in my State bloom as the special property of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, or of some other railroads that have had these land grants given to them, and have been built up by the munificent gifts of the United States. No railroad in Kansas has wider possessions than the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad. I would remind that officer that it is not any railroad like this which is struggling for existence; but his principal, the people. Let his sympathy be expended for them.

Mr. NEGLEY. Have not these roads built up the flowers of your State?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Not a flower. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1874.

SIR: In reply to the War Department communication of the 29th instant, herewith returned, referring request of the Hon. STEPHEN A. COBB, M. C., as to the amounts of cost of transportation of men and supplies for the Army over the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, and the Kansas Pacific Railroad, since January 1, 1873, I have the honor to report, that the money accounts of Colonel J. G. Chandler quartermaster, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, by whom the payments are made to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, so far as received here, show the amounts paid it for transportation service rendered since January 1, 1873, as follows:

For troops, (last payment October 30, 1873)	$4,984 71
For freight, (last payment November 19, 1873)	34,189 02

The accounts of the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company are settled through this office at the Treasury, and up to this date the amounts of the accounts received in this office are as follows:

For troops, &c., to September 30, 1873	$22,922 14
For freight to May 31, 1873	15,257 47

By act of Congress of March 3, 1873, no payments are made to the bonded Pacific Railroads, and for that reason those companies are indifferent as to sending forward their evidences of service rendered to the local quartermaster, by whom the accounts are prepared and forwarded to this office. This accounts for the remote period to which only accounts of the Kansas Pacific Railroad have been received here.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General U. S. A.

Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I ask now that one more telegram be read. The Government of the United States has advanced to the Kansas Pacific road something like $1,300,000 for interest, not to speak of the $6,303,000 bonds originally loaned. The paper of that road went to protest on the 1st day of January last, I am informed, and the first-mortgage bonds are now liable to foreclosure, and the United States will be deprived of every dollar of that $1,300,000, unless we collect something by way of transportation over that line. This amendment is not in the interest of any railroad, but simply in the interest of the Government. I ask the Clerk to read the paper I send to him.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1874.

Hon. S. A. COBB, Member Congress, House of Representatives:

Freight contract over Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad commenced May 22, 1873. Troops have been sent over the road, when most convenient and economical, since its opening. The bulk of freight was transported from July to September last, and of troops, during July and August.

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. COX. I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. RANDALL. As the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] presents a very important question, I suggest that the committee rise, allowing that amendment to be pending.

Mr. WHEELER. I accept that proposition, particularly as there appears to be a desire to offer other amendments. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KELLOGG reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Army appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed Mr. ALLISON a member on the part of the Senate of the joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia, in place of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, excused.

CONTRACTS AND EXPENDITURES FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith the report of the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 7, requesting "a statement of the extent and nature of the contracts, purchases, and expenditures for the Indian service made since July 1, 1873, setting forth which, if any, of them were made or entered into without conference with the board of Indian commissioners appointed by the President, and the extent and description of contracts and vouchers objected to by said board, stating to what extent payments have been made thereon against their remonstrance."

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 9, 1874.

The message, with accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WAR WITH MODOC INDIANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith reports from the Secretaries of the War Department and Department of the Interior, to whom were referred the resolutions of the House of Representatives of the 7th of January last, requesting "copies of all the correspondence between the different Departments of the Government and the peace commissioners during the war with the Modoc Indians, in Southern Oregon and Northern California, during the years 1872 and 1873; also copies of all the correspondence with, and orders issued to, the military authorities engaged in said war up to the period of the removal of said Modoc Indians from the States of Oregon and California."

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 10, 1874.

The message, with accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY CONTRACTS FOR RECOVERY OF TAXES, ETC.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, there was received this morning a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I would like to have read and printed. It relates to what are known as "Sanborn contracts."

The SPEAKER. That communication was referred at the close of the morning hour to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; but it ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. It is not now on the Speaker's table; it was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. The inquiry of the House has not been answered in that communication. I have read the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury; and he states that he will not give the information called for except upon further order of the House. I desire to have the House make such order; and I wish to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House with full copies of all contracts made under the authority of the Treasury Department in pursuance of one of the provisions of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill approved May 8, 1872, and also copies of all schedules and correspondence relating to said contracts.

Mr. McKEE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that it is more important to ascertain the amount of money that has been paid under these contracts than the mere names of the parties.

Mr. RANDALL. I am obliged to the gentleman for the suggestion; I will accept the amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. I suggest that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. I object to its consideration at this time, except for reference.

Mr. RANDALL. The Secretary of the Treasury manifestly asks for a further order of the House.

Mr. BURCHARD. The information has already been asked for, as I understand, and it is unnecessary to adopt another resolution. I call for the regular order, which is the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] objects to the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I am a little surprised at that.

Mr. BURCHARD. A resolution of that kind has already been adopted by the House, and it is unnecessary to pass another.

Mr. RANDALL. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his answer, does not give the information which the House has asked for.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I suppose I must consent that the resolution be referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means, and it will be so referred.

MARINE HOSPITAL, CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Mr. PARSONS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Commerce a bill (H. R. No. 1927) for leasing the marine hospital and grounds at Cleveland, Ohio, to the city of Cleveland; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1928) to provide for the more efficient administration of the laws relating to public lands; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed with an accompanying letter, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. McKEE that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 11, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FENTON. I present a petition of a number of citizens of New York, who ask a pension or other bounty for those who served honorably in the war with Mexico. It is signed by Major-General Hooker, president of the New York Association of Veterans of the Mexican war, and many others, members of the association. The memorial was transmitted to me by Colonel William Lewis Tidball, the worthy corresponding secretary of the association. It sets forth, in clear and forcible terms, the grounds of their appeal to Congress; and I ask for it the early and considerate attention of the Committee on Pensions, to whom it will properly be referred.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of John Parish, of Saginaw County, Michigan, praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Genesee County, Michigan, asking that a pension may be granted to John Parish; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of John Northwood, late a soldier in the service of the United States in the war of the rebellion, asking that the pension laws be so amended that the loss of an arm above the elbow may be treated in the same manner on the pension list as the loss of a leg above the knee; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of Samuel Wethered, a resident of the city of Baltimore, Maryland, praying the extension of his patent for carding-machines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of Mary Blanton, of Cleveland, North Carolina, widow of Burrill Blanton, deceased, a soldier of the revolutionary war, asking to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, which, being short, I will read, and ask leave to occupy about two minutes in some remarks upon it:

Resolved by the senate of the State of California, (the general assembly concurring,) That our Senators in the Congress of the United States are hereby instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote against and oppose the passage of the bill introduced into the House of Representatives by Hon. J. D. WARD, of Illinois, and known as "An act supplemental to and amendatory of the act entitled 'An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States,' approved May 10, 1872."

Resolved, That the governor is hereby requested to transmit copies of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The reason I desire to call the attention of the Senate particularly to this resolution is to say that by some blunder of the press, or in telegraphing, the bill which was introduced by Mr. WARD and to which I am opposed, believing it to be extremely injudicious, believing that it would be subversive of the mining interest of the mining States and Territories, was credited to me. It was telegraphed to the people of the Pacific coast that I had introduced this bill, and some very excited miners' meetings were held, one at Bullion City, Nevada, in which I was very freely criticised and denounced as being the author of a bill which my long knowledge of mining matters seemed to imply that I ought to have known better than to favor or introduce.

Now, I desire to say, in order to set this matter right so far as I may, that I have not introduced any such bill; that I am not in favor of it; that I am not in favor of a law to compel miners to apply for patents for their claims, except at their own discretion under existing laws; and that the criticisms which have been made upon me in consequence of the erroneous impression that has gone out are unjust to me. The scurrilous abuse, and the cowardly anonymous communications sent to me by persons ashamed of their own names, I do not see fit to characterize as they deserve.

I move that the resolutions be printed, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the passage of an act granting pensions to soldiers of the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of an Indian reservation in Siskiyou County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of an appropriation for turning the San Diego River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of California, and a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, California, in favor of an appropriation for the removal of the wreck of the ship Patrician, and the rock known as the "Noonday Rock," near the harbor of San Francisco; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of A. S. Macomber, of Hamilton, New York, praying for the extension of letters-patent for straw and stalk cutter; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of J. Hill and 145 other citizens of Saint Cloud, Minnesota, asking for an appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River between Minneapolis and Saint Cloud, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN presented a memorial of citizens of Chicago, Illinois, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to take from the table the two petitions presented by me some time since in reference to the government of this District, and also the memorial of the governor of the District, and that they be referred to the joint committee appointed for investigation into the affairs of the District.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the petitions heretofore presented by him, and the memorial of the governor of the District, be taken from the table and referred to the joint select committee. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ALCORN, it was Ordered, That the petition of J. D. Leflore and J. C. Harris be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. RANSOM, it was Ordered, That Bramhall & Co. have leave to withdraw their petition and papers from the files.

OREGON INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. MITCHELL. On the 3d of December last I submitted to the Senate a resolution in regard to the ascertainment of losses by citizens of Oregon in consequence of Indian depredations. I give notice now that to-morrow, at the expiration of the morning hour, I shall desire to call up the resolution and submit a few remarks upon it.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 185) for the relief of M. S. Hellman, of Canyon City, Oregon, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Annie Dorsey Reeves, of New Castle, Delaware, praying remuneration for the occupation of her property by United States officials, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 335) for the relief of the Chickasaw Indians, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that it do pass, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether there is a report in this case?

Mr. KELLY. There is not a written report.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should feel unwilling to act upon the bill until I know something about the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. KELLY. I hope the objection will be withdrawn. I will make a statement of it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I say I am unwilling to consent to take it up unless I know something more about the facts than I learn from the reading of the bill.

Mr. KELLY. I propose to state them, if there be no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will say further, that if it is a proposition to refer the claim to the Court of Claims, that is something I do not think we ought to do, unless there be some particular reasons why we should take it out of the ordinary rule.

Mr. KELLY. Very well, sir; let the bill go upon the Calendar.

Mr. BOREMAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Clement Wetle, praying payment of damages for depredations committed by Sioux Indians in 1861, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of William Mason, of Taunton, Massachusetts, praying compensation for the abrogation of his contract to manufacture one hundred thousand muskets of the Springfield pattern, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

ARMY OFFICER IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the consideration at this time of the resolution I offered yesterday, asking for information in respect to some matters in South Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate the information called for by the following resolution, which passed the Senate on the 1st day of March, 1873:

"Resolved, That the President be, and hereby is, requested to inform the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, whether any commissioned officer of the United States Army, while on duty in the State of South Carolina, has received, or attempted to procure, payment of any money or other valuable consideration from the Legislature of said State, or endeavored to procure legislation to that effect, as a compensation or reward to him for services performed in the line of his duty as an officer of the Army or otherwise; and whether any such officer, while so stationed and on duty, has been admitted to practice at the bar of said State, and has actually practiced thereat for his personal emolument, while receiving pay as an officer of the Army; and whether such officer is now on duty in said State, and, if detached from his regiment, for any and what service or purpose."

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to state to the Senate, as there seemed to be some misunderstanding, or some want of understanding, in regard to the nature of the resolution, which it seems to me cannot, when understood, fail to command the approval of every member of the body, that it is a resolution calling for information, in order that the Senate may be apprised authoritatively of the true condition of facts of the existence of which I have myself no moral doubt whatever, but prefer that the Senate should have the facts before them certified by the Administration itself.

Last March the knowledge was brought to me by very respectable authority that a great wrong was about to be perpetrated on the people of the State of South Carolina and a great injury upon the military service of the United States. The good name and fair fame of the officers of the United States Army are part and parcel of the glory of this country. The esprit de corps of that army is essential for its force, essential to enable it to maintain itself in the respect to which it is entitled at the hands of the entire country; and when any diminution is effected in any way by the action of any one of its officers, it is for the benefit of all that the impropriety should be instantly exposed and promptly corrected. None recognize the truth of this more fully than the officers themselves.

In March, 1873, the original resolution was adopted, asking for this information, "if not inconsistent with the public interest," and that amendment was made on the motion of the senior Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and accepted by me, although I could not imagine what public detriment could come from having such information as was called for; but, notwithstanding the resolution was passed in that guarded way, nearly a year has passed, and yet no notice whatever has been taken of it by the President. In the mean time a great part of the wrong has been accomplished, and the people of that unhappy State, well described by a northern writer as "the prostrate State"—a State once among the most honored and influential in the Union, but which to-day is a blemish upon the escutcheon of the country, and the condition of which is a source of sorrow and of shame to every honest American citizen—that State has been deprived of some $35,000 in the way of rewards offered for the conviction of the citizens of that State under what was known as the Ku-Klux act of Congress, which passed in 1871, and the Senate well know its provisions.

An act of the Legislature of South Carolina was passed offering large rewards to all persons, civil as well as military, who should arrest and furnish evidence to be used in the courts of the United States to convict persons for violation of the Ku-Klux act of Congress. Under that it was alleged that an officer of the Seventh Regiment of United States Cavalry, one Major Lewis Merrill, whose name I find in the official register of the Army, had been busy in obtaining the passage of an act by the Legislature of South Carolina to pay these rewards to informers, to procurers of these convictions, and chief among them himself.

On June 14, 1873, in a public newspaper called the Daily Phœnix, published in Columbia, South Carolina, I find a report of a commission appointed by the governor of South Carolina to distribute the reward of $35,000 offered for the arrest and conviction of persons charged before the courts of the United States with the violation of the Ku-Klux act; and I ask the Clerk to read the report which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The following is the report of the commission appointed by the governor to examine claims and make the awards:

COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, May 29, 1873.

To his Excellency FRANKLIN J. MOSES, Jr., Governor:

By your excellency's commission it was referred to the undersigned to examine the papers pertaining to the claims of sundry persons for the payment to them of the rewards offered by proclamation of your predecessor, Governor R. K. Scott, for the apprehension and prosecution of parties who were participants in what was known as the "Ku-Klux conspiracy."

Upon an examination of the papers we found that the parties who had been apprehended and prosecuted, in reference to whom the rewards were claimed, were of three classes, to wit:

1. Parties who had been apprehended and prosecuted to conviction.
2. Parties who had been apprehended as conspirators, but had been used as witnesses for the prosecution of others.
3. Parties who had been apprehended and were under indictment, but not yet convicted; and others as to whose guilt proof was furnished, but who are not yet under indictment.

In the first class, the parties for whom the rewards are claimed numbered one hundred and two; of the second class, the number was forty; and of the third class, the number was in excess of one hundred.

After a very careful examination of all the papers pertaining to the several claims, the committee concluded to recommend to your excellency that out of the appropriation made by the General Assembly and placed at your excellency's disposition for the payment of the rewards, the claims for payment as to parties of the first class should be first paid; that claims for payment as to parties of the second class should be next paid; and that the remainder of the appropriation should be awarded to claims as to parties of the third class.

The committee further report, after a very patient and careful examination of the claims of the several claimants, that they have made the awards as follows:

To Major Lewis Merrill:
Convictions, 47, $200 each	$9,400
Accomplices, 40, $200 each	8,000
Total	17,400
To Mr. Thomas M. Wilkes:
Convictions, 35, $200 each	7,000
To Mr. H. H. D. Byron:
Convictions, 6, $200 each	1,200
Total	25,600

In reference to fourteen of the parties enumerated as convictions, the committee have made no award, the claims not presenting satisfactory proof that the claimants were entitled thereto.

The committee have not as yet been able to consider fully the claims for the rewards in reference to parties of the third class, and must ask your excellency's further indulgence in the making of the awards.

Upon the conclusion of our labors we will report fully to your excellency, and in detail, the results of our investigations, and as to the rules which have governed us in our awards.

We respectfully recommend that the several amounts, as hereinbefore stated, be paid to the claimants, Major Merrill, Mr. Thomas M. Wilkes, and Mr. H. H. D. Byron. We have a record of the parties as to whom these awards are made, which we will furnish to your excellency with our final report.

Very respectfully, &c.,

C. D. MELTON.

COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, June 10, 1873.

SIR: We have the honor to respectfully submit the following supplemental report of our awards as commissioners appointed by your excellency to investigate and pass upon the claims of sundry persons, for the payment to them of rewards offered by proclamation of your predecessor, Governor R. K. Scott, for the apprehension and prosecution of parties who participated in what was known as the "Ku-Klux conspiracy."

We met on the 5th instant, and proceeded to consider class No. 3 of such claims, the only class we had not disposed of at the time of making our previous reports. Upon examination we found that there were one hundred and twenty-two claims presented. The balance of the fund for distribution being much too small to make awards for all the cases that we found meritorious, we were compelled to adopt, as nearly as possible, an equitable pro rata; and, in making our awards we acted upon the principle of giving each claimant the full $200 for the number of claims we had adjudged him, taking that number from the head of his list, leaving the remaining claims undetermined. Upon this principle our awards were as follows:

James Canton, six cases	$1,200
Colonel W. H. Brown, eight cases	1,600
Major Lewis Merrill, twenty cases	4,000
Total amount	6,800

Leaving a balance of $100 of the fund undisturbed. This occurs from the fact that the award to the commission was an uneven number, and we could not make an award for half a case.

A copy of the rules adopted by the commission for their government in making the above awards is hereunto attached.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH DANIEL POPE.

His Excellency FRANKLIN J. MOSES, Jr., Governor.

Mr. BAYARD. Now, Mr. President, the Senate have seen that an officer of the United States Army, while on duty, detailed specially for this purpose, drawing his full pay and emoluments as an Army officer, has received from the treasury of that plundered State $21,400 for procuring convictions under a law of the United States, the operations of which he was expressly detailed there on duty to facilitate. Under the act of Congress the President was empowered to use such portions of the armed forces of the United States as he saw proper to enforce its provisions; and this body of cavalry, under Major Merrill, were sent into South Carolina; and when martial law was proclaimed in that State his individual will and power superseded all civil law and government. I pass over, for the present, the shocking facts contained in the report of this commission, of rewards offered to the participants in crime for the purpose of procuring the conviction of their accomplices. More than a year ago I laid before the Senate full proof of the fact that in the United States court a man, whose hands were red with the blood of a victim whom he himself had shot while fastened to a tree, was brought upon the witness-stand to swear that he had committed the murder, in order to implicate a bystander who was then upon trial as his accomplice. Such things are shocking in the history of a country's criminal justice. How many of the miserable men from South Carolina, who to-day languish in the prisons of the State of New York, are there because of this reward of $35,000 paid for their conviction to those who, to accomplish the result, were compelled to admit that they themselves had been guilty of the crime. And this Major Merrill, an officer of the United States Army, holding honorable rank in that honorable service, through his share in this business is to take from that stripped, beggared, bankrupt people the poor remnant of their means, and in one or two terms of court to receive $21,400 from the treasury of that State. Now, sir, if these facts be true, let us know them, and let the people of the whole country know them.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to suggest to the Senator that this is not the only enormity of the kind to be found in our history. The Senator may remember that a few years ago the Congress of the United States distributed a full $100,000 among officers of the Army for just arresting one criminal, not quite so bad a one as these miscreants whose cases we are called upon to consider now.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know that the honorable Senator is detracting at all from the force of my remarks. It may suit his purpose to seek to divert the attention of the Senate and the country from the facts of this case. I state these facts in order that the majority who control the action of this body shall decide for themselves, and before the American people, whether they approve of the act of an officer stationed upon duty in a State lobbying bills through the State Legislature for the purpose of paying himself as an informer these enormous sums of money, in order to produce convictions in the criminal courts of the United States. In my opinion, nothing can detract more from the justly high estimation in which the officers of the United States are held by the people than the permission of such practices. They would be discreditable anywhere, and to any man; but it is outrageous that an officer of the United States Army, who was receiving from the public Treasury of this country his proper salary and emoluments, should be placed on duty in one of the States to use the time, and the means, and the enormous powers there vested in him as military commander in a time of martial law, given him for public purposes only, to turn all in favor of his personal gains, and for his own private gain, and private gain, as has been shown, of a most discreditable nature.

It may be that I am wrong in this. It may be that my opinion of the Army and of what the proper tone and character of an officer should be is different from that of the Senator from Wisconsin. It may be that he desires such a state of things as I have described should continue. I do not; and I certainly desire, when I have asked for this information in the regular and proper way, that it should be furnished by the official to whom it is directed. The resolution was objected to upon its original introduction by members of the majority, and has been objected to again, and it seems to me for no very good reason, because the information was to be given if not inconsistent with the public welfare. Now, sir, it cannot be inconsistent with the public welfare that money that reaches the pockets of United States officers by law should be known by the public from whom their pay is drawn.

As to the reward for capture offered in the case referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin, I do not care to discuss that now, as it has nothing to do with the adoption of my resolution. It was offered in great heat and haste and excitement; it was offered without warrant of law; it was paid, I believe, under law; but, as I remember, it was a reward offered by the Secretary of War in the midst of great public excitement, in his desire to discover the conspirators, if conspirators there were, in the dreadful assassination of the President of the United States. The cases are not parallel in any way.

The facts in this case are that Congress had passed a law called the enforcement act. The Legislature of the State of South Carolina passed laws, under the lobby influence, as I am credibly informed, of this same official, offering rewards to secure the conviction of these "miscreants," as the Senator from Wisconsin has properly called them, if they be guilty. No one can have greater horror of the crimes charged against them than I, and I am by no means to be led, indirectly or otherwise, into anything like an approval or condonation of their offenses. I would simply ask for a fair trial by fair testimony, and not by testimony procured, as this seems to have been, to be used to bring money—the reward for conviction—into his own pocket by an officer of the United States Army detailed and paid by the Government for the precise duty in question, of aiding the civil authorities in executing this very law, and this work done at a time when he had the whole community under his heel as military commandant during a period of suspension of civil law. And all this money was procured to be paid from the depleted treasury of that State; and the question is, whether such practices are to be approved by the American Congress and the American people.

The resolution I have presented is one calling for information; and I think that information should be given. If, however, having stated now my grounds for asking it, having stated now my reasons for believing the facts alleged to be true, and that they ought to come to us in an officially authenticated form, and also believing that it could not but be to the satisfaction of any right-minded man that such things as this should cease, that if wrongs and irregularities have occurred they should be properly punished and marked with the seal of reprobation, I shall leave the question to be decided by the Senate. I call for the question on the resolution.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to say just one word before he proceeds?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say to the Senator from Delaware that I understood him to be criticising the conduct of certain officers of the Army because they had received some money appropriated by a State as a reward for certain services, and I ventured to remind him that there was another case of precisely that kind in our history. The Senator says that these officers did no more than their duty. In the case to which I refer the officers did no more than their duty. It was their duty to arrest Jefferson Davis, and they received $100,000 for doing it. Now the Senator speaks of these officers lobbying a bill through a Legislature. I did not understand anything of that kind to be charged against them before, and I meant to excuse nothing of that kind in the remarks I made.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the passage of this resolution. The suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] that the clause contained in the original resolution that if "not inconsistent with the public interest" this information should be given, is perhaps proper, and that clause should be inserted in the present resolution; and I suppose to that the Senator from Delaware will have no objection.

But the name of an officer of the Army of the United States has been introduced in this discussion in such connection that I deem it my duty to rise to say a few words upon the general subject which the reference to that officer introduces, and with regard to that officer himself. He was introduced not simply as an officer of the Seventh United States Cavalry, but his name, Major Lewis Merrill, was given. It was stated that he was guilty of having accepted rewards in a manner which did dishonor to his profession; and further, that for the purpose of procuring those rewards he had been guilty of an offense which certainly no right-minded man would defend, much less commend, here or elsewhere, that of lobbying a bill through a Legislature for the purpose of having himself rewarded.

Mr. President, it was my privilege to meet Major Lewis Merrill during a portion of the time that he was engaged as an officer of the Army in the service alluded to in South Carolina, that of endeavoring to ferret out and to bring to justice the Ku-Klux who infested that State; and I have no doubt that the Senator from Delaware has received information of a character which has led him to entertain feelings toward that officer of the Army that he would not entertain had it been his lot to be a member of the sub-committee which went into the State of South Carolina and investigated those offenses in the region in which Major Merrill was situated.

If there is any one man living to-day to whom the people of Upper South Carolina are more indebted for good order, for the safety of their citizens and their homes, for the preservation of that part of their State from anarchy, than another, it is Major Lewis Merrill, of the United States Army; and I think that if I had many of the reputable citizens of the counties of Spartanburgh, Union, York, and Chester here to-day, whatever may have been their opinions or their feelings in the past on this subject, they would be free to say that his efforts principally prevented them from being carried into anarchy.

I learned, sir, the fact that, notwithstanding Major Lewis Merrill is an accomplished officer of the United States Army; that he is a gentleman of high personal and professional character; that because he went into that State and remained with his family—and let it be understood he intended to do his duty—his life was rendered as uncomfortable as that of any cultivated, sensitive, honorable man could be with his family under such circumstances. With a family refined, intelligent, and cultivated as any that surrounded him, they were all ostracized, all under the ban. No citizen of South Carolina who was at that time giving countenance to this Ku-Klux Klan, or even silent under its terrors, would cross Merrill's threshold, or permit Merrill's family to cross his threshold; and yet, sir, cool, calm, educated, a trained scholar, a man of judicial temperament, a man of great firmness and prudence, he went into that State, incurred social ostracism, refused to be either cajoled or flattered, and he tracked this infamous organization to its lair; he was instrumental in furnishing the evidence which finally brought its members into the courts of justice, in which it was characterized by an eminent citizen of Maryland taken there for the purpose of defending them, in effect, (I do not quote his words,) as one of the most infamous and blood-stained organizations that had ever disgraced civilization. These men and their friends are not admirers of Major Merrill.

A reward offered by the people of South Carolina through their Legislature, indeed! Why, sir, does the Senator forget that in many portions of South Carolina certain classes of the people were assessed by the leading citizens, whose names I gave on this floor upon another occasion, at so much per county, for the purpose of taking there gentlemen eminent in their profession for the defense of these criminals, and that public appeals were made through the press of the State to the people to come up and pay their contributions for that purpose and acquit them if possible of their crimes? Was it wrong in those who thought these men entitled to a fair trial to procure them that fair trial? No, sir; I say they were entitled to that fair trial, and I think they got it; but I am unwilling to have it said on this floor that an officer of the United States Army who thus discharged his duty has dishonored his profession, because he may have received—for I do not know how that is—a reward offered by the people of South Carolina for the purpose of ridding themselves of this organization.

I, sir, have so much confidence in the honor and in the integrity of that officer that I want all this information, every particle of it; but I wish to suggest to the Senator from Delaware that perhaps he will have to go to another quarter to get it. So far as the President can give us information from the War Department with reference to the character and the conduct of this officer, let us have it; let us have his record from the time he entered the Army down to the present hour. I do not fear it. But the information here called for is whether "an officer of the Army of the United States while on duty in the State of South Carolina has received or attempted to procure the payment of any money or other valuable consideration from the Legislature of said State." How is the President to inform us whether the State of South Carolina has ever paid Mr. Merrill this money or not? That will not be on file in the War Department. That may be ascertained from the public prints of South Carolina, from such a report as this which has been read, or from the official documents of the State of South Carolina. I submit that the Senator in offering this resolution is calling for information which a moment's reflection must have taught him the President cannot give us.

Fourth. And whether any such officer, while so stationed and on duty, has been admitted to practice at the bar of said State—and has actually practiced thereat for his personal emolument while receiving pay as an officer of the Army.

As I have already suggested, whether Major Merrill has received these rewards or not, I do not know. I regret that neither of the Senators from South Carolina is in his seat this morning, so that they might be able to say what the motives were that prompted their Legislature to offer these rewards, if such rewards were offered, and how the acceptance of those rewards in that State is looked upon.

So far as the question of his being admitted to the bar is concerned, I have no knowledge on the subject other than that, I believe, I did see announced in one of the newspapers in South Carolina the fact that he was admitted upon examination as a member of the bar; but that he ever practiced for his own emolument I have no knowledge, and I think it is not the fact. He was engaged in preparing the testimony for the purpose of bringing these trials into court, and when they were in court, I know from the reports which were sent to me of the trials, some of which are incorporated in the reports to this body, he was present, but not as an attorney aiding and assisting the United States district attorney in the prosecution of those trials.

Now, Mr. President, I have deemed it my duty to say this much, because the name of this officer of the Army has been introduced. I have deemed it my duty to say this much because of the reflection indirectly made by the Senator from Delaware upon the tribunals of the United States sitting in South Carolina, at least upon the verdicts which have been rendered in those tribunals, upon the ground that these rewards may have been the means of procuring the verdicts of conviction under which men are now serving their terms of imprisonment in the Albany penitentiary. Whether there may or may not have been a witness sworn upon those trials who did not tell the truth, I cannot say. I suppose there is an average amount of human infirmity even in South Carolina, and we may fairly infer that from the statement which the Senator has made as to its condition. But, sir, that all those trials, and that the sentences to imprisonment in the penitentiary of the men who made the soil of South Carolina red with the blood of innocent victims, and made the night air resound with the exclamations of the tortured, are to be characterized as procured by purchased testimony, is a position against which I must protest. I think the Senator from Delaware hardly intends it so broadly. It is too late to make the assertion, here or elsewhere, that there were not thousands of men in that State who deserved to be convicted, who were members of a murderous organization, and who did introduce a reign of lawlessness and violence through several counties of that State, which made every man, woman, and child feel that, if it went on for a short time longer unrestrained by the strong arm of Federal power, life, property, all, would be at the mercy of the mob. And, sir, when the name of the officer of the Army who has been chiefly instrumental in delivering that community from such consequences is introduced into the Senate in a manner in which it has been this morning, I feel it my duty to rise and make these statements, that they may go out with what the Senator from Delaware has said on this subject. Whether the information sought will be for his vindication or condemnation, or for the vindication or condemnation of South Carolina, I do not undertake in advance to say.

I hope the resolution will pass. I hope that whatever information the President has will be given, and if I am mistaken in anything I have said as to the character of this officer of the Army, if the evidence implicates him in any manner undeserving of the high position which he now holds, I shall be the first to join with the Senator from Delaware in condemning any improper or corrupt practices that may be shown to exist.

Mr. BAYARD. I am very glad to hear that the honorable Senator is determined not to stand in the way of obtaining this information. He has certainly addressed himself to a very congenial audience upon the subject of the outrages and wrongs in South Carolina. We all know that the Senator's time was largely occupied and his feelings intensely excited by the contemplation of the wrongs which he investigated there; and I have not one word to say in deprecation of his giving full vent to his feelings of indignation in regard to all that he has described. Perhaps I might, on a proper occasion, join with him in expressions of horror at any act of cruelty, of oppression, or of wrong. It is not necessary for me to compare myself with him.

This is a simple resolution asking for information which the War Department of the Government is perfectly competent to procure and furnish, which they were asked to give one year ago in a perfectly respectful and usual manner, and it has certainly been strangely withheld from the Senate and the country up to this time, and when the motion is made by me, as it was made yesterday for the purpose of having this omission supplied, it is met by objection on the part of gentlemen who represent the Administration in this Chamber.

Mr. President, I did not expect to hear a lawyer so distinguished as the Senator from Pennsylvania pronouncing objurgation against furnishing means to defray the expenses of counsel, and against the counsel of men charged with a heinous crime. If I know anything in the legal profession that makes it a source of pride to me to belong to it, it is that among its members have ever been found men willing to stem popular prejudice and popular fury in order to vindicate the law in favor of the most debased and unfortunate.

Mr. SCOTT. I trust the Senator from Delaware will bear me witness that instead of objurgating the procuring or furnishing of counsel, I said it was right that they should have a fair trial; and I was but contrasting the fact that assessments were made upon the people of South Carolina to defray the expense of that counsel with the fact that the Legislature had proposed rewards for the conviction of the defendants whom they were defending.

Mr. BAYARD. There undoubtedly was an assault upon large classes of the people of Carolina; thousands of them were declared to be the confederates and upholders of crime and guilt; a charge made upon the white population of that State which ought to have been answered by those who should represent them. There was no occasion for the Senator to make such charges or indulge in such wholesale assault. There was nothing in the resolution I have offered that drew it forth or in any way warranted him. The Senator has seen fit to make it, and to make it upon his own responsibility, and so let it go. I do not propose to stand here and fight over again the question of the propriety of the enactment of the Ku-Klux laws. I did what I considered to be my duty at the time they were introduced into Congress and my action is recorded, and I am willing to let them rest until an honest, a wholesome, a merciful, and a Christian public sentiment shall wipe them from the statute-book, and stamp them as the outrages upon law and civil liberty which I have ever believed and declared them to be.

But, sir, there was great need for those men to be defended. They were wretchedly poor; they were the victims of subornation and of perjury. It was a frightful state of things when a man could be permitted to enter the courts of the United States and stand with security upon the witness-stand avowing that he had with his own hand murdered a man, in order to convict an alleged accomplice, for whose conviction he was to be paid in money, and go himself not only unwhipped of justice, but largely rewarded. All this I have characterized as a stain upon the history of our criminal jurisprudence; and the phrase certainly was not immoderate.

Yes, sir, there was indeed great need for these men to be defended, because they were utterly impoverished. They were to be tried before juries not of their own countrymen; they were to be tried before packed juries; before juries of a different race from their own, highly inflamed by political adventurers against the white people. An indictment was equivalent to a conviction, and it was necessary that every safeguard of personal liberty should be exerted in the strongest manner to test the constitutionality of the acts of Congress, which authorized these men to be tried by tribunals of the Federal courts and not by the State courts of South Carolina.

It was——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 432.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like, without further debate, to have the question taken on the adoption of this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks consent to lay aside informally the pending order, for the purpose of taking a vote on the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not object to that if the Senator from Delaware will permit me simply to state, in answer to the broad assertion which he has made that these men were the victims of subornation and perjury, the fact that many of the men sentenced were sentenced upon their own confession in court.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator desire me personally to make a statement on the subject?

Mr. SCOTT. I say I do not object, but I wish to make that statement.

Mr. PATTERSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina objects to the further consideration of the resolution, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to lay that aside for the present in order to take a vote on this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves to postpone the pending order and proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been under discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. This resolution is likely to give rise to debate. I understand that the Senator from South Carolina desires to debate it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir; I have just come in, and I should like to have it lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will undoubtedly lead to debate, and I must insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

The motion was not agreed to.

MANUFACTURE OF SILVER COIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before proceeding with the unfinished business the Chair will lay before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting information, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 10th instant, as to the time which will be required after the resumption of specie payments for the mints to manufacture the amount of subsidiary silver coins which will be required to replace the fractional paper currency. If there be no objection the communication will be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. STEWART. As that communication is but short, I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 10, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the Senate requesting information as to the "time which will be required after the resumption of specie payments for the mints to manufacture the amount of subsidiary silver coins which will be required to replace the fractional paper currency," and to state that the capacity of the mints for the coinage of subsidiary silver coin, in addition to the gold, trade-dollar, and minor coinage, is equal to about ten millions per annum; and that if we assume the amount of fractional currency which will probably be in circulation to be from forty to fifty million dollars, about four years would be required for the purpose indicated by the resolution of the Senate, should provision be made for the substitution of subsidiary silver coin for fractional currency.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. M. H. CARPENTER,
President of the Senate pro tempore, Washington, D. C.

Mr. STEWART. My object in calling for that information was this: whenever specie payment is resumed, it will be necessary to have silver coin on hand, and with the view of taking some steps toward having the mints of the United States manufacture this coin in time, I ask that the communication be referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I suggest to the Senator that he had better refer the communication to the committee with an inquiry as to what time they are going to commence specie payments, so that we can have four years ahead of that.

Mr. STEWART. I can answer that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is hardly worth while to get into a discussion on this subject.

Mr. STEWART. I can answer the inquiry now. Whenever the farmers of the West come to the conclusion that they will keep a part of their surplus earnings at home, and not allow the gold board to take the entire surplus earnings of the country and all the money to New York to speculate in our depreciated currency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves that this communication be referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1922) to establish a reservation for certain Indians in the Territory of Montana;

A bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians;

A bill (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870;

A bill (H. R. No. 1578) authorizing the purchase of six hundred and forty acres of land for a Nez Percé Indian reservation in the Territory of Idaho; and

A bill (H. R. No. 200) for the relief of settlers on the Cherokee strip, in Kansas.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 43) authorizing a special court of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the bill on page 3, section 2, line 22, by striking out the words "or to deposit lawful money." Those words are not necessary and are not properly there. I have a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency calling my attention to the subject and saying that those words ought to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps the briefest way to explain it will be to have the letter of the Comptroller of the Currency read. I send it to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, February 6, 1874.

SIR: Upon careful reading of Senate bill No. 432, now under consideration, I find that the words, in line 22, page 3, "or to deposit lawful money," should be erased, the intention of the law being that the notes of such associations as shall fail to return their own circulation shall be assorted out until the requisite amount is returned.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

JOHN JAY KNOX,
Comptroller.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Chairman Finance Committee, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to obviate the criticism the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] made the other day when this bill was up, although I do not think it changes the sense of the section, I will move to amend section 3, line 1, by inserting after the words "passage of this act" the words "and without waiting for the return of circulating notes of other banks." The Senator from Indiana seemed to think that it would be necessary to have those words in.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to amend the bill in section 3, line 12, by striking out "25" and inserting "75;" so as to read:

Provided, That the whole amount of circulation issued to such banking associations, and withdrawn and redeemed from banking associations under the provisions of this act, shall not exceed $75,000,000.

My object in offering this amendment is to bring about that fair and equal distribution of the national currency which was contemplated by the currency act as it originally passed, and as it was afterward amended so that the bank circulation was increased $54,000,000.

As the law stood originally the national banking currency was to be distributed as follows:

That $150,000,000 of the entire amount of circulating notes authorized to be issued shall be apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, according to representative population; and the remainder shall be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury among associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of such State, District, and Territories.

At that time the maximum amount of national currency authorized by the national currency act was $300,000,000. Afterward by the act of July 12, 1870, the maximum amount of bank circulation was increased fifty-four millions, and it was provided in that act that this increase of fifty-four millions should be distributed upon this basis:

And the amount of notes so provided shall be furnished to banking associations, organized, or to be organized, in those States and Territories having less than their proportion under the apportionment contemplated by the provisions of the "Act to amend an act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved March 3, 1865, and the bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, to secure the additional circulating notes herein authorized, shall be of any description of bonds of the United States bearing interest in coin, but a new apportionment of the increased circulation herein provided for shall be made as soon as practicable, based upon the census of 1870: Provided, That if applications for the circulation herein authorized shall not be made within one year after the passage of this act, by banking associations organized or to be organized in States having less than their proportion, it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue such circulation to banking associations applying for the same in other States or Territories having less than their proportion, giving the preference to such as have the greatest deficiency.

That currency was to be distributed over the Union as provided by the sections of the banking law which I have read. This rule of distribution, however, was not observed. On the contrary, its plain letter, as well as its spirit, has been violated, so that the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut have in excess of the proportion due to those States $70,690,046. The States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland have an excess of the amount due them of $9,416,503. So that in order to bring about that distribution of currency which was contemplated by the original currency act and the amended act which I have just read from, it would require a redistribution of a greater amount than $75,000,000.

My object in proposing the amendment is to make the distribution what was originally contemplated, and it is necessary that this shall be done in order to promote the convenience, the interest, the wants, and the demands of the Southern and Western States at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to invite the candid attention of my friend from North Carolina to the purpose and object of this bill, because I see by his motion now that he has fallen into the idea that this bill is intended to accomplish some very great results. The purpose of this bill is simply to carry into execution an existing law. It was the anxious desire of the Committee on Finance to do this without bringing into consideration on this bill all the difficult questions that we have been discussing for some days. It is very easy for any Senator who insists upon it to offer amendments to compel us on this collateral bill to discuss the currency question, the redemption of the United States notes, and the whole financial policy of the Government.

But, sir, those questions are more properly reserved for another occasion. We have a great variety of bills upon which we shall undoubtedly have to act for or against an increase of the national currency. We have a general proposition now pending upon which a long debate has been had, and upon which I desire to have a vote as soon as possible. I trust, therefore, Senators will not avail themselves of their right to embarrass this bill, which has the simple, single object I have stated, by drawing into it the question of the increase of the bank circulation, or the increase of the currency, or the general equalization of the currency, or the question of free banking. Now, let me explain this bill.

By the act of 1870 there was provision made for an increase of the national banking circulation by the amount of $54,000,000. That amount has been exhausted. Then there was a provision in the sixth section of that act that after the $54,000,000 had been taken by banks in the South and West, there should be a further transfer from banks in the East to the West to the amount of $25,000,000. The sixth section of the act provided that after the $54,000,000 had been taken, the Comptroller of the Currency should transfer from the banks of New England circulation to the amount of $25,000,000, to be given to banks organized, or to be organized, in the West. The object of this bill is simply to carry into execution that provision of the law.

When the Comptroller was called upon to put in force the sixth section of the act he found two or three difficulties in the way.

In the first place the last provision of the sixth section of that act provided that this removal of circulation from the East to the West should not occur until after the fifty-four millions were taken up, and the question arose what was the meaning of the words "taken up." I think the fair meaning of that was, when subscribed for, pledged, authorized to be issued to banks to be organized in the West and South; but the Comptroller of the Currency held that the words would not have their meaning until after the circulation was all issued by him to the new banks organized in the South and West, so that until every bank that had applied for circulation filed its bonds on which to get circulation and received the last dollar it could not be taken out, and that could not in the ordinary course of things occur by the action of a great number of banks, for there would always be some that would not be issued; that full amount would never be reached. The result was that the sixth section was rendered practically nugatory.

Then the sixth section provided that one year's notice should be given to the banks in excess before this transfer should be made. That was believed to be too long. The provisions of this section were found to be, in other words, inoperative; and the Comptroller of the Currency, therefore, in his annual report at this session, called upon us for some construction or modfication of the sixth section of the act so as to enable him to carry into execution the existing law.

The only object of this bill is to remove the difficulties in the way of the execution of the law and to authorize this transfer. It does not affect the question of the increase of the currency; it does not change in the slightest degree the intention of the law of 1870; but it does enable the Comptroller by a prompt and sprightly process, immediately after the passage of this act, to authorize the organization of banks with circulation to the amount of $25,000,000, in the West and South, in States where they have less than their proportion—no more, no less. Then it provides to go on pari passu, that as the amount on the one hand of circulation is increased in the West and South, this excess of circulation shall be withdrawn from the East. It merely carries into execution the sixth section of the act of 1870.

Now what is the difficulty which meets us? The Senator from North Carolina says that $25,000,000 will not create an equal distribution. That is very true; nor will $75,000,000, nor will $100,000,000, nor will $500,000,000, nor will $1,000,000,000 make an equal distribution. The State of Rhode Island has, under the operation of existing laws, circulation to the amount of $61.60 per inhabitant, or an equivalent of banking circulation, if the same ratio was given to all parts of the United States, of $2,100,000,000. Therefore the attempt to equalize up, on the basis of the circulation in Rhode Island or in Massachusetts, would be practically impossible. But the $25,000,000 is enough. The Comptroller of the Currency states in his report, and it is a matter of actual fact which Senators probably can form an opinion upon as well as anybody else, that in all human probability the $25,000,000 provided by this act will not be taken up in one, two, or three years; precisely how fast no one can tell, because it requires capital to organize national banks, and that capital may not be abundant in the regions where the banks are desired. But at all events this bill will give an opportunity to organize banks with a circulation to the extent of $25,000,000 in all the Western and Southern States. Some of the Western States have already nearly reached their proportion, and they would not get much; but the great body of the Southern States would be benefited by this provision.

Now, is it not better to secure this $25,000,000, and thus enable banks to be organized where they are now locally needed, rather than to raise questions which, if once ingrafted on this bill, will prevent its passage, at all events at this session, and complicate it with many other questions with which it has nothing to do? That is the view taken by the Committee on Finance. Therefore we unanimously concluded, although we differ like other Senators here about the question of the increase of paper money, and as to whether that increase if made should be in bank circulation or United States notes, and about all the varied questions which have been discussed, that it is wise now to make provision for an organization of banks to the amount of twenty-five millions and withdrawing that much circulation from the East, in other words, to carry out the law as it now stands.

On examination, this has found, I believe, very little dissent from the persons who represent the Eastern States, so far as they are affected; and only three or four are affected. As the Comptroller shows, it will only affect four States, I think, and it only affects banks which have a circulation of over $300,000, so that this call can be made on these large banks for a portion of their circulation from time to time without making any great drain upon them. They can furnish the circulation, if they can, of their own notes, or, if not, they can deposit lawful money, and their circulation will be reduced to that extent. Those banks will to some extent lose their profit on their circulation; but it will not effect any severe or sudden change or derangement of monetary affairs, while in the mean time it would satisfy the people of the South and West by supplying them reasonably with the means or organizing all the banks they could profitably organize within a year or two.

I desire to state also that it was not intended by this measure in the slightest degree to affect the action of Congress in regard to the great questions which have been discussed in other bills. So far as I am concerned, and no doubt so far as each Senator is concerned, we intend to press an ultimate vote on the whole question of the currency. I am myself in favor of free banking, and I hope this Congress will establish that as the principle of the law. That, as a matter of course, will supersede this bill if it be passed, but in the mean time this relief may go on to the extent of $25,000,000. That $25,000,000 will be amply sufficient to satisfy all the demands now made, all the applications now on file, and all that in human probability will be made for at least a year or two.

When the debate was had on the bill of 1870, some Senators were very much dissatisfied at the limit of fifty-four millions. They claimed that the West and the South would take one hundred and fifty millions, and they were very much dissatisfied that we limited them to fifty-four millions. Well, sir, it took four years, from 1870 to 1874, of the most prosperous period of our history to organize banks enough to absorb a circulation of fifty-four millions; and I have no doubt if this $25,000,000 increase is authorized it will be all that will be necessary, probably, for the present. If, however, we should be able during this session of Congress to agree on some bill to provide for free banking, or some other system, as a matter of course the subsequent law would supersede this law and stop its execution.

This is all the explanation I think it necessary to make. I desire Senators not to embarrass this bill with all the complicated questions that grow out of other measures that are pending before us. We never can—there is the difficulty of this whole question—pass that legislation which we all agree about if Senators will put upon it propositions about which there is an essential and vital disagreement.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I want to say, by way of apology, that I had thought I should vote for this amendment; but the Senator from Ohio knows I cannot do so for the purpose of embarrassing the passage of the bill, because I do take an interest in the passage of this measure. I think it is required by the interests of that people whom I represent in part; but I cannot conceive how the adoption of this amendment should embarrass the passage of this bill. This bill, the Senator tells us, is intended simply to enable the Comptroller of the Currency to carry out an existing law. It is a little more than that, because what the Senator refers to as the existing law is a law which is incomplete and cannot be executed. Therefore it is not to execute the law to some extent. This is to complete the law.

Now, there is but one reason in the world why we should want to carry out that law, and that is that justice demands it. Well, if justice demands this also—if $75,000,000 taken from one section of the country and distributed through another section of the country will not do anything more than justice between the sections, then, instead of this bill being embarrassed, it should be advanced, by agreeing to this amendment. I myself, although I am going to vote for the bill as it stands, hate to do it, for the reason that I stated the other day. This practice of grabbing first from one section of the country to build up another, and then from the other to build up still another, I do not like to engage in. But inasmuch as I think the western portion of the country suffered badly in the last grab, and inasmuch as I can see at present no possibility of getting anything like approximate justice but by starting another grab, I think I must go into it under the lead of my honorable friend from Ohio. And since I have got to prostitute my character in this business of grabbing, I would rather make a little something more. It seems to me that $25,000,000 is too small a grab for us to sacrifice our characters for. Would it not be more respectable to make it $75,000,000 right off? For these considerations I am inclined to vote for the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, one remark fell from the Senator from Ohio that I think should be noticed. It was in reference to the manner of distribution of the $54,000,000 of circulation on the part of national banks which was to be distributed to the West and South under the act of 1870. His statement was that it had been four years before the $54,000,000 was taken up. It would have been very fair if the Senator had given the reason why it took four years. To make this broad statement to the country that we were four years taking up $54,000,00, and leave it just in that way without explanation, is not doing justice to the question before the Senate, in my judgment. Why was it four years in being taken up? Because the Comptroller of the Currency decided that each of the States that had not a sufficient amount under the law should have a certain proportion; and when my State took her proportion, he would not allow her to have another dollar until every other State had taken her proportion. Some of the States were not able to take, and have not yet taken, their proportion, and still the other States are deprived of any. That is the reason why it took four years, and that is the reason why I stated to my friend from Rhode Island the other day that we had to pay 2½ per cent. for circulation in the State which I represent in part.

Mr. MORTON. To establish new banks?

Mr. LOGAN. To establish new banks. For instance, South Carolina had not taken her proportion; and inasmuch as she had not, the Comptroller of the Currency would not give one dollar to any other State until she had; and in that way he deprived many of the States of their pro rata under the law. It was the act of the Comptroller of the Currency, an arbitrary rule laid down, which deprived the West of having her proportionate share of the money of the country; and under that rule we were deprived of it, and not because we would not take it. Why, sir, my State has applied for nearly every dollar of that currency, and could not get it. She would take it to-day if she was not deprived by the rule established by the Comptroller. Hence I say it is not fair to suggest that we were four years taking this currency, when we have had to pay a premium for nearly all the currency we have taken from broken banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Illinois will do the justice to say that the Comptroller of the Currency in 1865, Mr. FREEMAN CLARKE, made the decision.

Mr. LOGAN. I will do the justice to say that the remark I made does not apply to the present Comptroller, because the distribution was made before he was appointed; but still, it was the rule of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. I have no reference to the present officer, but I have reference to the rule established by the Comptroller, which did deprive our States of having their just proportionate share of the money. That the Senator well knows to be the fact. Hence, I said it was not fair to the country, who might not probably understand the reasons, or to us, to say that the States had not taken their share of the money allowed by the act of 1870.

Now, in reference to this proposition, I do not want, nor do I desire, to oppose any distribution of an excess of the currency held in one portion of the country, and its division with other portions of the country; but I do desire to call the attention of the Senate to the injustice of this particular act.

First, it is argued, as it was yesterday, that it is unjust to those persons who have organized banking associations and received their circulation from the Treasury of the country, to be deprived of it after they have organized under the law. I agree to that proposition. I say that proposition is correct. It is unfair when an association has organized under the law and received its amount of circulation by virtue of the law, to deprive it of that which it has acquired under the law. But inasmuch as the law has provided the way by which the circulation may be distributed, if we undertake to redistribute the circulation, how should we do it? Not unfairly, but it should be distributed fairly, justly, and equitably between the States according to "population and wealth," which is the language of the law. The law provides that it shall be distributed according to population and wealth. If that is the provision of the law, and we undertake to make the distribution, then let us make it in accordance with the provision of the law.

Now, the Senator says this is merely carrying out the existing law. I say it is providing a law. It is not carrying out the existing law, because the law that exists cannot be carried out; and this is a new mode and manner of carrying out a proposition, not the law—for that cannot be carried out, as has been demonstrated. It is a new proposition, directing that a certain amount of bank currency shall be divided among certain States not having their proportionate share under the law. If that is the meaning of this bill, why not, then, provide that it shall be distributed pro rata among the different States according, as the law provides, to population and wealth?

I have been criticised (and I do not object to it) in this Senate Chamber because I said the distribution should be per capita, or according to the wealth of the different States and the business capacity of the different portions of the country. It was said that is no way of distributing money; but while the criticism comes in opposition to my argument in reference to this proposition, I find the very gentlemen that make the criticism rise here and oppose a distribution, because their constituents have acquired under the law sixty-one dollars per capita. They say that is no argument; that when we ask for a distribution per capita, it is nonsense to talk about a distribution in that way; that we have plenty of money; and yet a State with sixty-one dollars per capita has not as much wealth in it as one county in my State. That is not too much circulation for them, but it is too much for us when we ask only a proportionate share according to justice in the premises.

Sir, I ask if we distribute this currency among the different States, that it shall be distributed according to population and wealth. And what shall we distribute? Distribute the eighty millions that the New England States and a few of the Middle States have in excess of their proportion under the provisions of the law. Now, let us see for a moment how this is. I find that Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, six States, none so large in population as our Western States, have $70,690,040 of bank circulation in excess of their proportionate share according to the law. Now, if these six States have $70,000,000 in excess of their share of the circulation of this country, is it not just, if we distribute the circulation according to population and wealth, to distribute that $70,000,000 in excess held by these six States? If we distribute the $25,000,000 in excess, provided for in this bill, upon what principle do we distribute it? We distribute it on the principle that a portion of the country has more than its proportionate share of the currency, and that another portion of the country has less than its proportionate share. That is the principle on which we do it. If we distribute on that principle, why not distribute according to the justice of the demand made by the States having a less amount of circulation than they are entitled to, according to population and wealth under the existing law? If it is just to distribute one dollar that they have in excess, it is just to distribute the $70,000,000. But when you take into account some of the Middle States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, I find that they have an excess of $9,416,503. Taking, then, the whole excess of these eleven States, and a small portion in one of the Territories, the District of Columbia, we find the excess to be $80,589,742. While they have an excess of that amount of money according to the rule that was prescribed by the law of distribution of 1870, I ask why that excess should not be equitably distributed among the deficient States, provided the latter States have the capital and are willing to take this circulation? It has been said that these other States have not the requisite capital. How are you to determine whether they have the capital or not, unless you give them the opportunity? If the circulation is not taken up by these States, it is not then taken away from the States that have the excess, because this bill provides that as application is made for the currency the Comptroller shall require these banks to deposit a certain amount of bonds in accordance with this law, and until that is done he will not withdraw circulation from any banks. If the capital does not invest in banks and purchase bonds, nothing will be withdrawn from the banks in the Eastern States; it will interfere with them not at all except when application is made on the proper basis by associations for this circulation in the different States having less than the amount allowed to them by law, or according to an equitable distribution.

I merely make these suggestions in reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina; but there are reasons why this bill should be very carefully considered, in my judgment. According to the provisions of this bill, I do not see how this currency can be distributed in any short time. First, there must be a notice to the banks who have an excess. They then place in the Treasury of the United States so much currency to be redeemed. Currency has first to be redeemed. After it has been redeemed, then it is distributed; and the notice is only given to existing banks as the application is made. An application is made for one bank for so much currency; then the Comptroller gives notice to some bank that has an excess that it must deposit a certain amount of its currency in the Treasury. Going through all this machinery, I do not believe this bill can be carried out so as to distribute this currency within any reasonable time. If it could be done, of course it would be a great incentive to support the bill, but I do not believe it can be done.

But then there are other reasons why I call the attention of the Senate to this proposition. I do not suppose delay is intended by the Senator from Ohio, because he says he himself is in favor of free banking; and if I understand free banking, I am sure I am in favor of it. It is to strike the shackles off, to strike down the monopoly that exists to-day in the hands of a few men, and leave every one having the requisite means to establish a bank to do it, forming an association under the law. It is to deprive a certain class of a privilege that they exclusively have, and give it to all; which certainly is just to all. Now, if free banking is the theory of the Committee on Finance, why do they not report a bill just in accordance with that without this provision? Why must this proposition come as an advance-guard?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to answer that now, with the Senator's permission.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee, at the last session, reported a bill for free banking and resumption; and as a matter of course, with my views, (the Senator knows them very well,) I never would vote for free banking and for issuing any more paper money of any kind, in any shape, form, or manner, unless there is some mode of redeeming it. Connecting these two ideas together, I think there will be no kind of difficulty in having free banking any day.

Mr. LOGAN. I am aware of the bill that was reported at the last session; I am perfectly cognizant of that; but I asked this question, and I did not intend to elaborate it, and I did not intend to go off into this, as I may call it, side argument on this proposition. But inasmuch as the Senator suggests that he is in favor of free banking—and I am glad to hear him say so—let me refer to what he says. It is true he reported a bill on that subject, but that bill creates a different system of banking from our present system. Our present system has been recognized as the best in the world; but when we ask that its privileges and provisions shall be extended to all the people having the requisite capital, it is denied; and you say, "No; we will extend it to you in another form." There is the trouble about it. If this system of banking is the best system that we or any other people have ever had; if it is a good thing to have it as a monopoly, it is good for all the people if they can have it and if they have the money to organize under it; and it is not going to damage the country to make free banking, restricted precisely as the law restricts national banks to-day, allowing the deposit of bonds and the issue of circulation on 90 per cent. of the face-value of the bonds, with the same restrictions, the same observances, and the same safeguards thrown around it as are thrown around the national-bank associations of the present day. That is the proposition that we desire: to extend the privileges now given to the few to other people outside, so that all may engage in this pursuit if they desire to do so.

But, as I was going on to say, I called the attention of the Senate to this bill because, although it is not so intended by the Senator; although it is not so intended by the Committee on Finance, it will be an obstruction to the passage of a bill extending the privileges of the national-bank system to more persons than now have them. Although it is not intended to be an obstruction to any increase of the currency if the country demands it, yet it will practically be an obstruction. It is somewhat singular that the Comptroller is so anxious about this measure that it finds its way into the Senate ahead of the propositions that were discussed here for weeks. Why not act upon them and decide the questions that have been discussed, and fully discussed, and relieve the minds of the people as to what we intend to do; whether we intend to resume specie payments at once, under the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury this morning, stating that it will take him four years to coin enough silver to redeem the fractional currency? I say that this bill, in my judgment, is in the way, and will be in the way, of arriving at a conclusion as to what we shall do on these other propositions.

When we shall ask that more currency shall be issued upon a proper basis, properly regulated, under the banking law, we shall be told, "Why you have got $25,000,000; wait until you take that up." That is the argument that will be used, and it will be used by the very gentlemen who favor this proposition. "You have got $25,000,000; wait until you take that up," with provisions in the law that will prohibit us taking it up; with provisions in the law that clog the way to the taking up of currency by the people in our country who desire to do so, as we have been obstructed in taking the $54,000,000 that were provided for by the law of 1870.

I do not oppose, and shall not oppose, a distribution of the banking currency. I shall be very glad to have it, if we can get nothing more; but I would prefer to let the New England banks have their sixty-one dollars per capita, as they have in Rhode Island, if they desire to keep it; and I believe they do not like to let it go, although they think six or seven dollars per capita is enough for us out West. I am willing that they should keep it, but increase the currency so as to give us the same opportunity that you have. That is all we ask. I believe that this bill would interfere with that measure, and for that reason I call the attention of Senators to it. I ask them to examine it carefully and see its bearings in reference to the other propositions that are behind this one before we act upon it. I am willing, as far as I am concerned, to be governed by the views of those who agree with me in reference to those measures; but I do desire that a careful examination shall be made of this bill before we agree to it. I know that some representatives from the West disagree with others of us in reference to the necessities of our country, talking about capital returning, and all those things, that I do not answer now, but at the proper time I will try to do so if the subject comes up again. I desire to call their attention to the amount of money that we have and the amount of banking capital under this law, when we can receive no more, and are restricted so that we can receive no more. Ohio has $23,000,000; Massachusetts has $59,000,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. How much did they have before the national banking law? We had $21,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. Who?

Mr. ANTHONY. Rhode Island.

Mr. LOGAN. Before what?

Mr. ANTHONY. Before the national banking law. We had as much banking capital before as we have now. The General Government forced our banking capital into the national system, and forced yours into it. They forced $21,000,000 of ours and $1,500,000 of yours. It was a lottery. We took a ticket, and you refused. The ticket drew a prize; and now you who refused to buy want to divide the prize with us.

Mr. LOGAN. O, that is it!

Mr. ANTHONY. That is it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad the Senator has made that remark. He says before the war they had $21,000,000. Did they have enough?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; and we should like to have more now.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. If the Senator's constituents had $21,000,000 before the war, and have $21,000,000 now and still would like to have more, in God's name why do you stand here and obstruct the way of the Northwest and other portions of the country that are as much entitled as you are to obtain the same amount? Why do you stand here day after day and oppose striking off the shackles that bind us, and oppose giving to us the same opportunity that you have had? You say you wish you had more. Rhode Island is a gallant little State; it is a rich State; and it will always be rich over and above others, provided it has the power to put its heel upon the neck of every other State and stand there with its money-changers in order to deal out money to us at high rates of interest. Why, sir, that great State of Rhode Island ought to have twice the amount of currency it has now, and Illinois should have none! Then we could come and borrow from you and pay you high interest!

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. LOGAN. I will hear the Senator's answer.

Mr. ANTHONY. That was the relation of the States of Illinois and Rhode Island when every State had all the banking capital it required. We did not want to pass our banking system under the national law. The nation appealed to us, and when the youthful valor of the country responded to the call of the Government, the patriotic wealth of the country responded also, and one was as necessary as the other to put down the rebellion. The Senator from Illinois went into the field and rendered gallant service. We did the same so far as our limited means of men would allow, and we gave to the country our wealth. We gave all the men we had and we gave all the money we had. Illinois had more men and had less capital. Each gave all of both that it had. And now the Senator from Illinois claims that, after having refused to pass its wealth, its capital, under the general banking law, we who did it, we who took all the risk and who have adjusted our business to it, must give it up and have it transferred to those States that refused to take it.

The mere surrender of the circulation is a matter of very little consequence in itself. I do not estimate the profit upon the circulation at much over 1 or 1½ per cent. Anyhow, I venture this prediction, that when this bill has passed, as I suppose it will pass, the West and the South will not take advantage of it. I predict that they will find a better use for their capital than putting it into national banks. But we have adjusted our business to this system; we have been compelled to adjust our business to it; and now to compel us to make this change is putting us to a disadvantage and injury far beyond the mere loss of the profit on the circulation. That is of little consequence to us. If you will repeal the general banking law, if you will allow us to go back to our old system, to our own State banks, which in Rhode Island were as good banks as ever existed anywhere, we shall be willing to give up all the advantages of your general banking law. We did not ask it; we were forced into it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I gave way to the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought the Senator asked me a question.

Mr. LOGAN. I did ask a question, and I say I gave way to hear you, and I was very glad to hear the Senator's statement. What does it prove? That in Rhode Island they had $21,000,000 before the war, and they used what money they could during the war, and what men.

Mr. ANTHONY. It was nearly $22,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. That is immaterial. The difference is small. They were great patriots. Nobody objects to that, and nobody doubts it. I made no question of that, and I did not use the word. I had not spoken in reference to what men did during the war, nor do I care to do so, for it has nothing to do with this proposition. I admit everything the Senator said in reference to the patriotism of Rhode Island. No question was made on that point. But the Senator says his State had $22,000,000 of banking capital before the war, and have $21,000,000 now. I believe that is his statement.

Mr. ANTHONY. What does that prove?

Mr. LOGAN. It proves that it took $21,000,000 to do the business of Rhode Island before the war, and that it takes no more to do it now; and it proves that that State is finished; that it is a completed State. The Senator must remember that in our country we grow a little faster than that. The Senator must remember that we have nearly three million people in the State in which I live, and there are quite a number of other States nearly as large, and Ohio is larger; that we have increased in wealth as well as in population; that we are not completed. We are building our houses, extending our farms, extending our business, growing every day, and we need more capital every day, instead of standing still at the one measured sum and the one measured amount. It is not so with the New England States. They are in a condition now to accumulate. We are not. We are using our money to develop our country. Your country is developed and you are now accumulating. There is the difference between the East and West, and the East and South; and it is a great difference, and has a great deal to do with the amount of money required by the different portions of the country.

I was almost tempted—and I do not believe it is right to spoil a good story at any time by not telling it; I was almost tempted—into telling a story, in connection with what I said about Rhode Island being finished, of a gentleman who went over there to sell soap. He was a peddler and he went into Rhode Island, this patriotic and good State, which sends good men, gentlemen, nice men, to the Senate; and I am glad to meet them. The peddler commenced his auction, "Here is your nice soap." They got after him to make him pay license. He took his satchel under his arm and went off about fifty yards and said, "I am out of your darned State now; who wants to buy some toilet soap?" [Laughter.]

culation proportionate to their own, I think is a very small business in this or any other Chamber. In the State in which I live, we have a banking circulation of $17,000,000; Rhode Island has $21,000,000. Now I do not say it by way of drawing any invidious distinction, but I do say that I can take the whole capital of Rhode Island and the whole State, and set it down in one county in my State.

Mr. ANTHONY. Can the Senator take the whole internal revenue that we rendered to the Government and put that down in one county of his State?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; I can put in the county of Cook all the internal revenue from the whole State of Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. How much was it?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not recollect; but I have examined enough to know, as far as internal revenue is concerned, that one county in my State pays more than the whole State of Rhode Island, and if you will examine the figures you will find it so.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LOGAN. O, yes; I have no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not desire him to yield unless he chooses to do so.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the congressional district in which I live yielded, in the year in which the largest internal revenue was rendered, more than $4,000,000 of internal revenue; and I think it might be understood that the conditions which enable one of the two districts in the State to render $4,000,000 of internal revenue must imply a large amount of productive business and that requires a large amount of banking capital; and you, by your laws, have made it impossible to carry on banking profitably except under the national banking system. It is not the system that we wanted; it is the system that we were forced into; and we cannot employ our banking capital profitably in any other way, and we cannot carry on our business without it.

Mr. LOGAN. What I have said that has aroused my friend from Rhode Island was not intended to draw any distinction of an invidious character. Nobody doubts the energy, nobody doubts the honesty, nobody doubts the capacity, nobody doubts the power of the people of Rhode Island; but that has nothing to do with the question. I was only trying to show, if I could, the great distinction that had been made by the laws of our own country between his State and mine, that we are entitled in justice to all we ask; but that the laws of the country have, as practically administered, given them facilities which should have been divided with us. I do not ask the Senator from Rhode Island to divide his capital. We have made no such appeal to Rhode Island, or Massachusetts, or any of the New England States; but what we have asked for, or some of us at least, has been that you strike off the shackles from my State that confine us in the narrow limits that are made by the laws of Congress, and that we may have the same opportunity that you have had.

Mr. President, these were the objections I was making, and I intended to follow them up by the statement that if the Senators here who oppose an increase of circulation intend that this bill shall be taken by us in lieu of any measure on that subject, so far as I am individually concerned—and I speak for no one else—I will not, as a representative of Illinois, accept it; I will not agree to it. I will not take it or accept it in any way whatever as having anything to do with the proposition of an increase of the currency; nor will I accept it, so far as I am concerned, in satisfaction of a distribution of the currency. It is not just; I will not say it is not honest; I will not use such a term as that; but I say it is not just to the other States of this Union, if a distribution of the currency is to take place, if it shall not be divided according to the amount of currency there is afloat in the country. If you gentlemen in the East intend to retain your capital, give us an increase of the currency. If you do not intend to retain your capital, but are willing to divide it with us, then divide it according to the rules of equity, and let the eighty millions in excess in your hands be distributed equally among all the States of the Union, according to population and wealth. I am therefore in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] but will increase it, if I can, five millions more, to make it comprise the eighty millions of excess of circulation held in New England and some of the Middle States.

These are the reasons that I desire to give in calling the attention of the Senate to this bill, that it may be understood and disposed of upon the principle of an equitable distribution of currency, if that is the proposition that is to come now before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this is manifestly a half-way measure. It is not even that. If the currency is to be equalized among the States simply by a redistribution of the present amount, if that is the policy to be adopted, this bill does not go one-third of the way. I wish to be distinctly understood upon that point; if the policy is to redistribute the currency without increasing the amount, this bill does not go one-third of the way; it is not a one-third measure. If it is right that the currency shall be equalized at all, it is right that it should be fully equalized. There is no principle of justice that will make it stop short at one-third.

We are told all the time that we are poor; we cannot take it. I deny the statement. My own State was better able to take $30,000,000 on the 15th of September last, the day of the panic, than she was to take $10,000,000 on the 15th of September, 1865; and that is true of Illinois, and it is true of other States in the West and South. Their capacity and ability to absorb this national banking capital and currency are constantly increasing, have increased greatly in nine years, have vastly increased in the last four years; and a large part of this amount would be taken in my State alone if the opportunity were offered; and yet it is constantly thrown in our face that we are poor, and we cannot do this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question in that connection?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did the State of Indiana or its citizens take any part of the provision which was made by the existing law, for a certain amount of millions being taken up by the Western States before this change was to go into effect?

Mr. MORTON. You mean the $54,000,000?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Whatever the sum was.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; the State of Indiana took very rapidly all that she was entitled to take of the $54,000,000, and there have been scores of applications for banks since that time. I have now in my committee-room numbers of applications which have been made within the last two or three years for banks that could not get the currency. They have quit making these applications now, because there is no use in making them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You say, then, if I understand you, that all the provision that had been made by the law which would benefit the State of Indiana to the full extent to which she was entitled to it, she availed herself of?

Mr. MORTON. So far as the fifty-four million was concerned, she got all of that fifty-four million that she was entitled to. Other States that had a greater deficiency than Indiana got more in proportion, as a matter of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But she took, if I understand you, all that the law would give her?

Mr. MORTON. Of the fifty-four millions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of any other millions that the law authorized her to take?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I beg the Senator's pardon; all that could be.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me to interrupt him on the point that he is discussing about the ability of his State, by way of suggestion to him, I will give the figures. The total of the personal and real estate of Indiana in 1860 amounted to $528,000,000; and in 1870 it was more than double that, over $1,268,000,000. Her manufactured products in 1860 amounted to forty-two millions. In 1870 they were nearly treble, amounting to one hundred and eight millions; and that was the regular proportion of the different Western States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The period of the war was the most profitable one, I take it.

Mr. MORTON. I am not speaking about the period of the war; but I say during that decade the growth was just as I have said, the growth was unparalleled; and in the four years of this decade, commencing on the 1st of January, 1870, the growth of Indiana and of all those States has been greater than for any corresponding four years in the history of the Government.

Now, in regard to this twenty-five millions: suppose this redistribution is confined to that, not one dollar will go to Indiana, to Illinois, to Michigan, to Wisconsin, or to Iowa. It is possible that Missouri may get a very small portion of it, but there are other States in the South and West that have a greater deficiency than any of these States, and they would get the twenty-five millions. My own State would not get a cent of it; it is no relief to Indiana; it is no relief to Illinois; it is no relief to Michigan. And I come back to this principle: that if this adjustment is to be made, not by increasing the currency but by redistribution, this bill falls short of being one-third of the amount.

Mr. President, it is not very pleasant for us to come here and have to beg for simple and manifest justice. Here is an inequality that every man in this country understands, and that in my part of the country is bitterly complained of; and yet when we ask that this injustice be removed, we are met with the answer "Why, we offered it to you and you would not take it, and you do not know what is good for you; it is not good for you to have it now." We have been told upon this floor that it is not good for us.

Mr. ANTHONY. Who has said so?

Mr. MORTON. That has been said in substance scores of times on this floor, that it was not what we wanted; and that what we really wanted was specie payments. I will now come to what my friend said yesterday. I have it before me.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it has been said, the Senator can tell who said it.

Mr. MORTON. That has been the substance of what has been said here. I think my friend came near saying it yesterday, as I will show him.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us hear.

Mr. MORTON. What did my friend say yesterday? He is opposed to the increase of the currency one dollar. He made a speech yesterday objecting to taking one dollar from Rhode Island, and I think he is right about it. But what is his remedy? His remedy is to return to specie payments; that is all. Now, if we were to take a part of the currency from Rhode Island he says that would derange their business, do them great injury and wrong. I think it would. But would a return to specie payments compensate Rhode Island for that? Certainly not. How then will the return to specie payments compensate us for our lack of currency and our lack of banking capital? The argument is as good one way as the other. If we take away all Rhode Island has got and give her specie payments, would that make her whole? But his argument is that specie payments will make us whole, although we have not half as much as we want. So far as the twenty-five million is concerned, it would supply some States; but my own State gets nothing, Illinois gets nothing, Michigan gets nothing, and Wisconsin, I undertake to say, would not get a dollar of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Illinois has the largest deficiency of any of the Western States.

Mr. MORTON. No; Missouri has the largest according to my recollection, and I think the deficiency in other States in the South and West is such, that even Missouri would get very little, if any, of it.

But now I want to come to a remark made by my friend from Ohio. He is opposed to increasing the currency now, and is willing to redistribute the twenty-five millions, but says he is willing to give us free banking. Free banking upon what terms? Upon the terms that Rhode Island and Massachusetts have already got this currency? Not at all; not upon equal terms; but he is willing to give us free banking when we get specie payments; upon condition that we adopt his theory, and upon that only. We are to be coerced into the adoption of his theory by refusing us any relief until we do; and then if we adopt his theory, if we agree to convert the greenbacks into a 5 per cent. bond, he is willing to give us free banking, but only on that condition. We say that is a different proposition. We are entitled to be put upon the same level with other States without being hampered by that condition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would apply it to all the banks.

Mr. MORTON. Of course you would apply it to all the old banks; but we are to remain as we are, and this is to be a cast-iron system until such time as we agree in regard to the Senator's theory as to the resumption of specie payments. Some of us do not believe in his theory; I should be surprised if there was a majority of the Senate that did; but my friend is unwilling that there shall be any increase of the currency, or anything for our relief, for Indiana or for his own State, until we shall agree to his theory, and then he will give us all we want.

Now, I wish to call the attention of my friend from Rhode Island to what he said yesterday. I always listen to him with pleasure; and I agree to nearly everything he said yesterday, and I think there is sound reason in the remonstrance of Governor Padelford and others, from Providence, in regard to taking currency from Rhode Island. I would much rather see Rhode Island left in the enjoyment of what she has. She needs it, or she would not have taken it; and they confess that to take it from her would be to derange her business and to impair her prosperity. I have no doubt of that. Neither Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Vermont, nor New York, is willing to give up one dollar; their Senators may, for certain reasons of public policy that to them seem good, but I mean the people themselves are not willing to do it. Governor Padelford has but expressed the sentiment of the bankers and business men who are to be affected by that thing. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I tell my friend that with us it is an entirely indifferent question, merely so far as selfish interests go? There are other States in New England that have so much more banking capital that if you took away the whole $25,000,000 it would not withdraw any of the banking capital of Vermont. We stand, I believe, in a state of entire indifference to do justice between Rhode Island and Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. Now, while my friend from Rhode Island remonstrates against taking away any portion of their currency, what surprises me is the absolute unwillingness to recognize the wants of other localities. I cannot understand that. Rhode Island needs what she has; the Senator says so; Governor Padelford says so. We need more than we have, but we are not allowed to have it. We stand here begging for it, almost, and we are told we cannot get it. I am surprised that my friend from Ohio has repeated it so often on this floor that we are too poor to take more. The capacity of Ohio is increasing; it doubles every ten years, almost trebles, and it has vastly increased in the last four years, has greatly increased since Ohio had the chance of taking a dollar of this currency.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. If the South and West cannot take more than $25,000,000, authorizing the taking of it will not hurt anybody. We shall not take more than we can.

Mr. MORTON. That is apparent. Everybody can understand the force of that. If we cannot take it, it does not do anybody any harm; but we can take it.

Mr. HOWE. Then it will hurt.

Mr. MORTON. Yes; and that is the trouble about it.

My friend from Rhode Island drew a contrast between the banking capital of Rhode Island and the States of the Northwest before the war. I admit that. Bear in mind that the increase of population in this country since January 1, 1860, has not been less than one million four hundred thousand, three-fourths of it in the West. The increase of population during the four years of this decade, if it has gone on in the same ratio of the last decade, has not been less than five millions, and three-fourths of it is in the West, while Rhode Island is comparatively standing still in population, though increasing in wealth. I have no doubt Indiana, Ohio, and Missouri, and all those great States are growing with greater rapidity than ever. Will not my friend recognize that fact? He sayswe would not take this capital when it was first offered. Suppose we could not; if we are able to take it now, shall we not have it? Must the thing stand just where it did at that time? Will not the Senator recognize that we are growing, and will he not concede something to our growing wants and our necessities? That is all we ask in this matter. We are asking simple justice.

My friend from Rhode Island said another thing yesterday. He is sincere in it; but I want to call his attention now to the doctrine that he uttered:

> That the circulation of banks, wherever situated, will flow to the money centers, to the creditor points, is as plain as that water will seek the lower level; and as water, if confined to a higher level, will break away through all obstructions, and follow the descending channel, so will money, equally, and by a law of not less force than the law of gravitation, flow to the points where it is wanted to perform its proper function—to pay debts.

If that doctrine is good, it would not hurt Rhode Island if we took all her currency, all her banking capital, because the money would flow right back there anyhow. That is the argument of my friend; but he would not like to try that experiment. The proposition, I say, is radically wrong. Why? Because money loaned by banks must flow back to the banks, must go to the bank-center every sixty, ninety, or one hundred and twenty days. If the men doing business in pork or grain, or any kind of business, in Indiana, are compelled to go to Rhode Island to borrow their money, they must send that money back to Rhode Island. Whenever the bill is due the money must go back; but if they borrow it from banks in Indianapolis, or in Milwaukee or Saint Louis, the money comes right home to pay the debt, and it is there again to loan to somebody else.

Mr. ANTHONY. They send the grain and pork to Rhode Island, not the money. That pays the debt.

Mr. MORTON. I presume they do not pay for everything they get in the West with pork. That does not affect the argument at all. The advantage of having banks everywhere is that the money borrowed returns right to the neighborhood and is there to be loaned again when it is paid in; and as fast as a neighborhood, a county, or a State is able to take increased banking capital, it is to their interest to do so, and upon the plainest principles of political economy they should have the power of doing it. The question is not whether we were able to take this banking capital in 1865 or in 1866. The question is what are we able to do now, what are our wants and interests now; and whatever we are able to do now, and whatever is our share in the fair distribution of the financial advantages of this great system now we are entitled to have, without regard to the way things stood nine years ago.

Now, to show how this matter stands, I have a little statement here that I take from the census report of 1870. I believe it has been already given in substance by the Senator from Illinois, but I have it here in a compact form. The aggregate population of the six New England States in 1870 was 3,487,924 persons. The aggregate population of six Northwestern States at the same time, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, Ohio, and Michigan, was 10,985,162 persons. The aggregate wealth of the six New England States at that time was $4,039,875,000. The aggregate wealth of these six Northwestern States was $8,347,067,000. At that time, according to the basis of the act of 1865 for the distribution of this currency, the six New England States were entitled to $39,799,000; but they got $108,548,881. The six States which I have enumerated in the Northwest were entitled to $99,361,974, but they have now only $77,444,904; so that there was an actual deficiency in these six States that I have named of twenty-two millions in 1870, and now in 1874, four years afterward, that deficiency has been increased to more than thirty millions; so that these twenty-five millions will not supply the deficiency in these six States alone, to say nothing about all the other States.

I submit, Mr. President, that the demands of the Western States and the Southern States are entitled to some consideration on this floor; and if the Senate will not at present concede that proper consideration, it will come after awhile. If it does not come at our hands, it will come at the hands of somebody else. The people out there understand this thing well. I undertake to say—and although it has been said very prominently in some of the eastern presses that western members of Congress do not study works of political economy and do not understand the financial question at all, and though we have been told that we do not know what is good for us—that the body of the people out there believe they do understand it, and the great mass of them are demanding an increase of currency. You may think they are all mistaken, all wrong about it; but that is their opinion. They believe they understand their interests, and all they ask is that there shall be a fair consideration of them, and I beseech our friends in the East most kindly to give to us that proper consideration.

Lord Bacon once said that the great curse of philosophy was theory, because the fashion was in his time and before that to form the theory first and then make the facts conform to it; and I may say that the great curse of our finances this day is theory. Theories are attempted to be applied to our country which are inapplicable in its present condition and under its peculiar circumstances. It is an attempt to make an old country out of a new one. We have a new country under process of development, and you cannot make it an old one; it is not to our interest to make it an old one, but it is to be treated as a new country.

I said in the beginning of this debate some weeks ago that the normal condition of the currency was specie payments or paper redeemable in specie when the country itself was in a normal condition. I agree to that now; that should always be kept in view; but I said further, and I say it now, that there are periods in the history of every country when specie payments cannot be maintained, and would be destructive if they were maintained. We could not maintain them during the war. To have done so would have been to destroy the power of our Government. We were compelled to resort to irredeemable paper. We shall get away from it as we get away from the effects and consequences of the war, and we cannot do it otherwise; and if we attempt to do it by a hot-bed process, it will be unnatural and disastrous.

Mr. President, there is no more sense in a scarcity of money than there is in a scarcity of food. As an abundance of food strengthens the body and gives it action and energy, so an abundance of money stimulates business and industry, and promotes the growth and the prosperity of the nation. "O, but," we hear it said, you will increase speculation. Well, sir, I am not very much frightened at that. Speculation is the great stimulus of growth and prosperity after all. Some kinds of speculation are not profitable; speculation in stocks is not; but speculation is the great stimulus of growth and prosperity. The man who bought fifteen years ago an addition to the town of Chicago and laid it off into lots and sold it out was a speculator, but he was at the same time a public benefactor. The man who bought a tract of land in Colorado and laid off a town and settled a colony there, and built houses and shops and manufactories, was a speculator, but he was a public benefactor. Speculation has given you thirty-five thousand miles of railroad in the last nine years. The men who projected those roads and built them did it as a speculation; but they have added vastly to the development and prosperity of our country. Plenty of money—not an excess of it, but plenty of money—makes business active and prosperous, and promotes the growth and development of a nation.

Now, I want to say to my friend from North Carolina, in reference to his amendment, that if there is to be no increase of the currency, if our eastern friends are determined upon it that there shall be no increase, and that all that is to take place is to be a redistribution between the States of the existing volume of bank currency, then his amendment is right, only it falls $5,000,000 short of the amount required for a full equalization of this currency. But I believe that taking $75,000,000 from the Eastern States and giving it to the West and South would disorganize business, would produce panics and disasters, and I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island, that taking a small amount, even, from Rhode Island would have a disastrous effect on her business. I should myself dread the experiment of seeing $25,000,000 taken from one set of States and given to another. Still, if there is to be no increase of currency, and we are to depend upon redistribution entirely, the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is right. But I think it is for the best interests of the East, the West, and the South that there shall be an additional amount of currency. I believe that at least forty or fifty millions of additional bank currency are demanded by the best interests of the country. I am not for an excessive amount; I am for what I believe to be a reasonable amount.

I think it better all around that there shall be an increase of the currency than to attempt to tear it from one State and give it to another. I would not take a dollar from Rhode Island or Massachusetts if I could help it. As my friend from Rhode Island said yesterday, I do not believe Rhode Island has a dollar more than she wants, or that Connecticut has a dollar more than she wants. I would leave them all they have; but I would ask that we shall have an additional amount to relieve our wants and our needs. While I would concede to them all they have and would do nothing to mar their prosperity or growth, we ask at their hands that they shall allow to us at least equal chances and advantages. If we are so poor, as they state, that we cannot take it, then, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] said awhile ago, there is no harm done, there will be no inflation, there will be no increase. But if they are not right about that, if my friend from Ohio is as badly mistaken as I think he is, then we are entitled to more.

I said on a former occasion, some time ago, that increasing the national-bank currency a moderate amount would not cheapen the value of greenbacks, would not increase the premium on gold, would place no obstacle in the way of resumption. Why? Because under the present system the national-bank notes are to be redeemed in greenbacks. It would increase the demand for greenbacks, rather increase their value. The fact that you increase paper money in times of specie payment, which is redeemable in coin, does not decrease the value of coin; it rather increases the demand for coin as a means of redemption; and if we were to add forty, fifty, or sixty millions to the national-bank circulation, we should not cheapen the value of greenbacks in the least; it would in nowise increase the premium on gold. There is no reason why it should.

My friend from Illinois answered a statement of the Senator from Ohio that it took four years to take up the fifty-four millions of additional bank currency allowed by the act of 1870. His answer was exactly right. Indiana took up what she was entitled to right away; Illinois did the same thing; other States did the same; but under the construction of the law, as long as South Carolina failed to take the last $50,000, we could not get any more.

Mr. President, there can be no excuse for taking a dollar of the national-bank circulation of Rhode Island or Massachusetts, except upon the principle that we shall not increase the volume of currency at all. If that is settled on, then we shall have to insist upon having a fair distribution. There ought not to be a dollar taken from the East and given to the West and South, except upon the principle that there ought to be no increase of the currency.

One word to my friends from the South. When the war was over they were without capital; they could not take the national-bank circulation. They are rapidly recuperating; and as fast as any neighborhood or any State recuperates so that it can establish an additional bank it ought to have the privilege of doing it. We are not going to have a radical change in this banking system. Let nobody act on that idea. This system is established. Its roots have struck deep into the business and policy of this country. There will be no radical change. The best thing for us to do is to try to equalize it and make it as just and proper and as perfect as we can. From year to year the States of the South will demand more; they will need more; and from year to year we of the West require more. All that I ask is that the system shall be so adjusted that we can get it as fast as we need it. If we do not need it, and have not the means of taking it, no harm is done; but put it in a position where we can get it if we do want it.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a moment to call the attention of the Senate to some figures in answer to a colloquy between the Senator from Rhode Island and myself?

Mr. SARGENT. Very well.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am sometimes mistaken, but I dislike to be when I am——

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from Rhode Island is not in his seat.

Mr. LOGAN. As my attention is called to the fact that the Senator from Rhode Island is not in his seat, I will wait until he does appear. I wish to show him a statement that I have here.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I had not supposed that under any circumstances I should be induced to make any remarks upon these financial propositions, and I do not now propose to offer more than a very few suggestions. Fortunately for my own State, during the past ten years, or since these financial problems became of interest, it has had a stable currency; it has had a currency peculiarly its own; and during all that time we have not had, by reason of the abundance or superabundance of money, inflation of values; nor when the business of the country or other causes effected a proportionate decrease in the volume of the currency have we had prices falling, breaking down our business and reducing the value of our property. We have had during all that time no panics of any description and scarcely a notable failure.

I know it was urged some years ago that the attitude of California toward the national currency was unpatriotic. I thought then, and think now, that the charge had no foundation. All the legislation of our State could be summed up in a single paragraph, an amendment to our practice there, which provided that where a party had made a promise in writing, of course for an adequate consideration, to pay a debt in any particular currency, the judgment should follow the promise, and that execution might issue and be enforced in the kind of currency for which the promise was made. Certainly the legislation in itself was equitable in the highest degree as between our citizens; and I have been pleased to know since that time, the Supreme Court of the United States, in passing upon a similar question, decided that such legislation was proper in view of the national legislation. But, sir, whether or not it was entirely patriotic or just toward the national Government, it certainly has been a very great conservator of the interests of our own people. We have been superior to those storms which have beaten in other parts of the country and frequently carried desolation in their track.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement to the Senator from Rhode Island, who is now in his seat?

Mr. SARGENT. I will.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from California. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to a statement that he and I both made. I asserted that one county in the State of Illinois paid more internal-revenue tax than his whole State. He controverted the proposition, and insisted that his State paid more. Now, I desire to give to the Senator from the official reports a statement of what the two States have paid.

Illinois paid $16,493,169.34 for 1873, and Rhode Island paid $324,552.78. That is the difference. Now let us see as to the districts. The first district of Illinois paid in 1868, $3,998,000; in 1869, $6,000,000; in 1870, $8,000,000; in 1871, $7,000,000; in 1872, $6,000,000; in 1873, $6,798,000. I give only round numbers. That one district paid that many millions each year. Now for Rhode Island. Let us see how much she paid during the same years. I am comparing one district of Illinois with the whole State of Rhode Island. The year one district in Illinois paid $3,998,000, Rhode Island paid $2,000,000; the year that one district in my State paid $6,000,000, Rhode Island paid $1,000,000; the year that one district in my State paid $8,000,000, Rhode Island paid $1,288,000; the year that one district in my State paid $7,000,000, Rhode Island paid $672,000; the year that one district in my State paid $6,000,000, Rhode Island paid $639,000. Last year, when one district in my State paid $6,798,000, the whole State of Rhode Island paid $324,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Has the Senator got through? Mr. President, I spoke of "the year in which the largest internal revenue was rendered." I did not suppose that after we took off the tax on manufactures and retained taxes mainly on whisky and tobacco, Rhode Island paid so much as those States where the great distilleries are. I spoke of the year in which the largest internal revenue was rendered. I was not so green as to suppose that when we have but a single distillery in the State of Rhode Island and very little manufacture of tobacco, we pay as much revenue as the great distilleries of Illinois do. Perhaps we do some patriotic service in drinking up the whisky. [Laughter.]

But now let us see what the figures were in the year when the largest internal revenue was rendered, which was the year 1866. The State of Rhode Island, with 217,000 people, rendered in internal revenue $6,121,000 that year, and the State of Illinois, with more than ten times her population, rendered an internal revenue of $15,300,000. The year before the State of Rhode Island rendered an internal revenue of $4,300,000, and the State of Illinois, with more than ten times her population, rendered an internal revenue of $9,523,000. The revenue from Illinois was a little more than twice and a half our internal revenue at the time when the great returns were made from that source, though her population was ten times as much.

Mr. President, I do not state that as any evidence of wealth. I do not state it as an evidence of the patriotism of the two States; but I state it as the evidence of those conditions in the two States that require banking facilities. We cannot have banking facilities under the general banking law without circulation, for we cannot carry on our banks profitably without circulation. The reasons which enabled us to render this great amount of internal revenue are the reasons why we should have banking facilities.

Mr. LOGAN. I asserted that one district in my State paid more taxes than the Senator's whole State, speaking of the present, while they have twenty-one millions and we seventeen millions of bank circulation; I gave the returns from the year 1868 up to the present time. For the six years from 1868 to the present time one district in my State has paid twice the amount of tax, and to-day it pays ten times the amount that the Senator's whole State does.

Mr. ANTHONY. My friend was very careful not to go back to "the years when the great internal revenue was rendered."

Mr. LOGAN. I can go back there and show you that one district in Illinois paid more than your State did.

Mr. ANTHONY. One district paid all you did pay. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. That does not make any difference. [Laughter.]

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, resuming my remarks, California being thus independent of this question, I think I have been enabled to listen to the discussions which have proceeded with something like impartiality, certainly with a desire to learn and be governed in my vote by that which should seem to be the better proposition advanced. If the proposition were to fund the greenback circulation which is now afloat, to redeem the promise of the Government of the United States to pay in money or other equivalent the paper which has now been so many years in the hands of the people, drawing no interest, and that promise unredeemed, and to redistribute that amount to national banks organized in the various States in the proportion to which they might be entitled, I certainly should be in favor of a proposition of that kind, for the reason that, if there is anything (and perhaps there is much) in the claim of Senators from certain States that they have not now, under the existing laws, the power in their States to have the banking capital to which they are entitled, this would give them an opportunity, while at the same time it would not lead to an inflation of the currency, which I believe would be dangerous to the public prosperity.

It is very true that money, and it may be said abundant money, is as necessary to the business of communities as is abundant food to the individual. But there is the same danger of a plethora of money to the body-politic as there is of a plethora of food to the human body. It will produce torpor by day and restlessness by night. It will produce diseases in the system, either of the body-politic or of the individual. There is a necessary proportion between the amount of currency that will float in a community, whether it is of gold and silver or an irredeemable paper currency, or a paper currency that may be redeemed in gold and silver, and the amount of business, the amount of wealth, and the amount of population of the country. There is a necessary proportion between these things; and wherever that proportion is exceeded there comes unwholesome speculation, speculation where money is carelessly invested, where there is not sufficient circumspection in making investments, and the returns are uncertain, and frequently exhausted. I know that the lines between legitimate business and speculation are not clearly defined; but certainly unwholesome and unhealthy speculation is encouraged by too great a volume of currency.

Now, sir, the aim which is sought by gentlemen is by some means to keep within certain communities the proportion which would be convenient for those communities to transact their business. Why, sir, it is just as impossible to do it as it is to keep water upon an inclined plane. If the State of Rhode Island sells more of its products to Iowa than Iowa sells goods in exchange, the balance of trade of course is against Iowa, and the amount must be settled in money. That causes the money to flow to the State of Rhode Island, and it will be there whether the bank that furnishes the currency is organized in Iowa or in Rhode Island. If the importers and manufacturers of New York send more goods to Illinois than Illinois sends back to New York, the currency will necessarily flow to New York, and will remain there, and the West will be drained of it.

I admit that there is much justice in the claim of Senators that if there is a profit in the organization of banks, if there is a profit upon the currency which is circulated, as unquestionably there is, each community should have the opportunity to have its share in the rewards of enterprises of that character; but it would simply benefit the few corporations in each State who might organize these banks, and there, it seems to me, the benefit would stop, and the currency that might issue from these banks would flow eastward or flow wherever the balance of trade would carry it. If any Senator will look in his pocket and find any money there, he will find notes of various denominations of national banks from every State in the Union, brought here by a law of demand or by a balance of trade or by necessities of trade. And what is there to take them back to the banks which issued them? If the currency goes back at all, unless there is a balance of trade to carry it back there, it is because this currency is borrowed and interest is paid upon it in order to return the money to the banks which originally issued it, to be taken away again after a temporary stay, following the ordinary currents of trade.

For these reasons—and I do not wish to enlarge on them—it seems to me that while there may be justice in the claim that more national banks should be organized in States which now have not their proportion, they should be organized, not by an inflation of the currency, which is certainly as large now in proportion to that of other nations as the amount of our capital, the amount of our business, and the amount of our population would justify, but by withdrawing the greenbacks which are afloat, and which cannot by any system we can devise be distributed among the States, and supplying that amount by the currency of the national banks, and let those banks be organized. But it seems to me that gentlemen will find that the theory is a foe to philosophy, as my friend from Indiana quotes from Lord Bacon, that the theory will not work, that the currency will not remain in Indiana or Illinois, or any other State simply because it was issued there, but will follow the inevitable laws of trade.

I am opposed to inflation of the currency; and for these reasons I shall favor this bill, because I believe that, so far, it gives an opportunity to work out the theory which gentlemen advance; and I will favor a proposition of recalling the greenbacks, and funding them, and redeeming the promise of the Government in reference to them, and reissuing that amount to national banks which may be organized in the various States.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, it was not my intention to say one word on this bill. It is well known to Senators that on general principles I am against the increase of the national-bank currency; not that I entertain hostility to the national-bank system any further than it works a monopoly, which under existing legislation makes it adverse to the welfare of many sections of the country, and to that extent inimical to the interests of the mass of the people.

In the remarks that I submitted at length on this question of finance, suggestive of a remedy for recurring evils, I based that remedy upon population, fixing the ratio, as I believed, justly throughout the States; and yet equitable as such a distribution upon population would appear, we are met by the statement of some Senators that that is an unfair basis; that instead of population we should base it upon the wealth of the country. Now, sir, we have the evidence before us of irreconcilability between theory and fact. We have the theory of legislation, which seeks to take from the New England States $25,000,000 of circulation and distribute the same to the Western States which have not their due proportion; and after the lapse of years the fact is officially stated that it has been a practical impossibility to enforce that legislation.

The Senator from Rhode Island asks me if I include the Indians in the population, and I say I take the population of the country as the census has given it to us, and based upon the population of the country, so ascertained, I have stated and argued—and I believe it is not controverted—that the distribution is now unequal. I say that the statute of withdrawal and equalization has lain a dead letter, and the Comptroller of the Currency has in his official report declared that it was practically impossible to execute it.

Now the chairman of the Committee on Finance proposes a supplementary bill to enforce that statute; and we find the Senator from Rhode Island, representing his constituency, protesting against its enforcement. Sir, if nothing else could convince me of the fact that the country has not circulation enough, it is this very circumstance and fact which the Senator so ably presented yesterday, accompanying the petition he then presented, that the little State of Rhode Island, with its small area and meager population, might, relatively to other States, be called sparsely settled.

Mr. ANTHONY. "Sparsely settled!" It is the most thickly settled area in the whole nation.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Yes, sir; but the area is so small that I say now, as compared with other States, its population stands as though it were sparsely settled. The Senator may say that the area is small and thickly settled, and yet I will show the Senator that the population has not increased in the ratio that the Western States have increased. The Senator has objected to the enforcement of this law, because, as he says, the citizens of Rhode Island demand the full volume of circulation they now enjoy. If there were nothing else, this fact which the Senator has stated in his remarks, and embodied in the petition he presented, assures the country that Rhode Island has no more circulation than she needs, and yet she has, under the national banking system and distribution, thirty-one dollars to every head of her population, and, United States currency included, her circulation is over sixty-two dollars per capita. The average circulation throughout the country of national-bank notes is about nine dollars. We find that Rhode Island has thirty-one dollars as her proportion of this circulation, and I am confining my remarks now to the national-bank circulation, because that is what the bill now pending proposes to equalize, and does not propose to touch the United States, or greenback issue.

We have contended upon theory that we are entitled to an increase of circulation, and when we come to the practical method of withdrawing from New England the surplus of her circulation and distributing it to the West, to give a more equitable distribution, we find New England at the threshold raising her protest against the proposition. It is the requisition of your unenforced statute, and it is now proposed to give vitality to its execution; simply that and nothing more; and the alarm is sounded against compliance with this just statute.

I have risen more especially to raise an objection to the nature of the amendment presented by the Senator from North Carolina. While I am not opposed to an adequate increase of circulation, in whatever form, still I am disinclined to any withdrawal of circulation from New England, believing that she has no more than she is entitled to. But upon the same basis and upon principles of equality, if not generosity, I appeal to the Senator from Rhode Island, and his colleagues from New England, that they meet the West upon like basis, and give us an equal circulation to that which they now hold.

The Senator very aptly, and I may say rather ungenerously, responds that because they held the capital in the midst of the late war when the West utilized all her means in other ways, they availed themselves of the opportunity to invest in bonds, and laid the basis for circulation while the West and South did not. I remind the Senator that under the fifty-four million increase the West attempted to avail herself of it, and received a greater proportion of that than she did of the former issues of national-bank currency, thus proving that when the West had an opportunity to use her means by investing in national banks, she did so beyond the ratio she possibly could under the first issue. Now I say to the Senator that if he will give the West the further opportunity that she had in the distribution of the fifty-four millions she will then place herself just where Rhode Island stands to-day with her thirty-one dollars per head.

May I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to another fact? Population has increased much faster westward according to the last three censuses taken by the Government. The total population in Rhode Island in 1850—and while I speak of Rhode Island, represented by the honorable Senator, and of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I do it to illustrate the rest—I take Rhode Island to be a fair sample of New England, and I shall take Michigan to be a fair sample of the West. The population of Rhode Island in 1850, I repeat, was 147,000; in 1860, 174,000; in 1870, 217,000. That of the State of Michigan, in 1850, was 397,000; in 1860, 749,000; in 1870, 1,184,000; and notwithstanding we find that the State of Rhode Island has to-day a circulation of $13,000,000 of national currency, while the State of Michigan has but $7,000,000. The circulation of Rhode Island is nearly double that of Michigan, while the population of Michigan is five times that of Rhode Island. Upon the basis of population, therefore, Rhode Island has received and is holding a relative circulation vastly greater than the State of Michigan; and if those two States are fair representatives of the two sections, then I say upon that basis that the West has not the circulation to which it is entitled.

But the Senator says that population is an unjust basis. Let me then call his attention to wealth, if that is considered the fairest basis. The value of the real and personal estate in Rhode Island in 1850, according to the census, was $80,508,000; in 1860, $135,000,000; in 1870, $296,000,000, in round numbers. The real and personal estate of Michigan in 1850 was $59,000,000; in 1860, $257,000,000; in 1870, $719,000,000. So that, whether upon the basis of population or upon the basis of wealth, the West is far below what she is entitled to as compared to the New England States.

Mr. President, I am of choice opposed to an increase of the national bank circulation. Could I have my choice, it would be of an increase of United States notes, or greenbacks. Considered in the light of public policy, or of economy, I believe that to be the best for the country; but I am willing to waive for the time even that choice, rather than the denial of an increase of any form of circulation. I have already proposed to waive all incidental features of the plan I suggested until the question of increase be determined, believing that to be the vital one now before the country. I believe to-day, as stated by the Senator from Indiana, that that question is made the vital question by the people. If increase is denied to-day, the people will not rest until they have what they are justly entitled to.

The Senator from California, representing a State doing business in some measure upon a gold basis, urges that there should be no further increase. We have, then, upon the other extreme the New England States, holding much more than their proportion of circulation, also advocating no more increase; both extremes urging resumption, and thus holding the South and the interior States, as it were, between the upper and nether millstone, crushing their industrial interests through resumption, and thus arresting their resources and retarding development; and for what? To pay tribute still more to the sections that enjoy so largely this monopoly.

I do not intend to prolong remarks at this time. Before taking my seat, however, I desire to call attention to another point made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. Twice, I think, has it been stated that there are $5,000,000 in the Treasury awaiting distribution, and the Western States do not avail themselves of the opportunity of securing their proportion. I can verify what has been stated by the Senator from Indiana as the experience of his State, that from Michigan there are several applications pending before the Comptroller, and yet that officer decides that Michigan is not entitled to any more until this $25,000,000 is withdrawn from New England. When that is done, she can have a portion of that amount, but until then there are other States with greater claims—other States being similarly situated. The chairman of the Committee on Finance may be reminded that that is the reason why the $5,000,000 is not taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator certainly misunderstood me if he understood me to say that all the $54,000,000 had not been taken. Indeed I insisted that it had been taken a year ago; but the Comptroller decided otherwise; that is, although it is promised to banks in process of organization, yet, as the currency has not been issued, he holds it has not been taken; but I insist that it was taken when subscribed for under the law. The whole $54,000,000 was taken, I think, some time last summer, perhaps as early as last spring; but it has not been issued, because some of the banks failed to file the requisite bonds upon which circulation could issue. Therefore it is true the whole of the $54,000,000 is not yet issued but is "taken," in the language of the law.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator took the position that even if an increase of the currency was given to the Western States, they would not avail themselves of it, and, in support of that position, as I understood him, he cited the fact, and I think he stated it the second time, that there were still $5,000,000 unissued. If, as he says, it is taken in the language of the law, it seems not in the phraseology of fact. If I misapprehended the Senator, I shall be happy to be corrected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said it could not be taken so rapidly as Senators supposed; that I thought $25,000,000 would last at least two years; and that is my impression now.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. One word more, sir, in connection with the statement made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] yesterday, and I was sorry to hear him state it. He said that during the war New England, having so much of capital invested in these bonds, it gave her the basis for her circulation, while the West did not avail herself of such provision. Sir, the West was impoverished at that time, but did not neglect her duty notwithstanding. She furnished what she possessed. She furnished her men, if she had not the money. New England had her money, and proffered men. Great credit is due New England for both; but as compared with the West, New England fell far behind the West in the ratio of men. If the West had not the capital, it was its misfortune, and the good fortune of New England that she had abundance. Now that the West has filled up her thinned ranks, and with accumulated means asks that the same Government she helped to defend shall distribute circulation to her upon an equal ratio to that of New England, is it magnanimous, is it just, to refuse?

The Senator from New Hampshire at my back [Mr. WADLEIGH] says that they have given us the men to populate the West; if so, their former representatives stand in their places here now to deny to those men in the West the rights which they gave to them before leaving their parent States at the East. A transfer of home in a common country should not work a denial of rights. Upon principle, as well as magnanimity, I ask them to give to the West the same privileges, the same benefits, the same aid that they demand for their own citizens.

Mr. President, I am not disposed to cultivate any sectional interests here. I am unwilling to divide the people of this great nation upon a question of finance; and yet it is becoming so vital to the prosperity of the people that it will divide the sections and divide the people unless justice is done. It is a question that rises above party into the domain of country. The greater interest must include the less. If the East protest continually by their acts and by their voice against a fair distribution to the West and South, sooner or later a combination of interest will demand it, and if based upon population and right, which I think they have, that demand will be felt and made effectually known.

The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] in his late speech, alluded to the national banks, and spoke of the amount of capital which lay idle, and gave an illustration which would lead one to conclude that there was no great object in investing money in national banks. I may at some time exhibit to him the profits of some of these banks, and show that notwithstanding they have but 75 per cent. of their capital utilized under the banking system, yet they make, in many instances, an average profit of 17 per cent. The annual increase of the national wealth is but 3½ per cent. Now I ask, upon broad principle, whether there is justice in confining the circulation to a section or to a monopoly, and depriving other portions of the country of the benefits of a like system? Either open it to all or break it for all.

Mr. ANTHONY. What do you mean by 17 per cent.?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I mean that a dividend is declared semi-annually of from 10 to 11 per cent., and the surplus besides added to the annual dividend makes 17 per cent., as I can show.

Mr. ANTHONY. Where do they divide that?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. That surplus is added to the capital.

Mr. ANTHONY. Where do they divide 10, 12, or 15 per cent.? They do not do it in our State.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. They do it elsewhere if they do not in Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. The average of our dividends I do not think is over 8 per cent. I speak for Rhode Island.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I did not rise to present details, but only a general statement; but as the Senator has questioned the statement, and perhaps does not enjoy the profits in his State that some others do, I will give him a case, say in the city of Chicago, as the Senator from Illinois has compared the large revenue that is paid there with the whole State of Rhode Island. I will not name the bank, but the official report gives its condition thus: The bank was organized January 11, 1865. The present total capital is $1,000,000. It commenced with $500,000. It increased its capital in the year 1872 to $750,000, and in October, 1872, it increased it to $1,000,000. Now let us see what the profits have been. The amount paid as dividends was $1,150,000; amount carried to the surplus fund, $200,000; leaving undivided $50,000; total net profits during that whole time, $1,400,000—$400,000 in excess of the capital of $1,000,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose any capital in Illinois, judiciously invested, could be made to yield 10 per cent. I suppose you can loan money in Chicago upon undoubted security for 10 and 12 per cent. It is not the national banking system that gives that privilege. In my State the rate of money to-day is not over 7 per cent., and we make no such dividends there. The excessive dividends that are made in the western portions of the country are due to the high rate of money, not to the banking system.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. But, sir, we have not the faculty in the West of making ordinary business pay 17 per cent. interest annually. The Senator states that we can get 10 per cent. upon investments. That may be true. That may be done in the State of Rhode Island. I cannot say.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator will allow me to suggest to him that in Rhode Island, with the large banking capital they have there, and the large circulation, they are able to lend their money at 7 per cent.; but in the States in the West where banking capital is small, money is loaned at from 1 to 1½ per cent. a month.

Mr. GORDON. I was going to ask the Senator from Michigan if it was not his opinion that if the State from which he comes had sixty-one dollars per capita, money would be at 7 per cent. there also?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. That is the ground which I have taken, and it has been commented on in this debate. I have taken the ground that the expansion of the currency—not the inflation, as some Senators have endeavored to characterize it, but an expansion equal to the expansion of business—would in its effect reduce the rate of interest; that in proportion to the adequacy of currency the rate of interest would be reduced; and the very reason why there is such opposition to the proposition to make the currency convertible into three sixty-five bonds is because that would be construed into a national declaration that the rate of interest should rule lower.

Mr. SCOTT. Before the Senator passes from the subject of dividends, permit me to call his attention to the official statement. I understood the Senator to state that 14 per cent. was the amount of dividends made upon the national banking capital and surplus. Now, in the report of the Comptroller for 1873, page 55, he will find a table showing the dividends for 1873, and on the following page he will find one showing the dividends from 1869 to 1873. The average of all the national banks as shown for 1873 is 5.46 per cent.

Mr. MORTON. Semi-annually.

Mr. SCOTT. For six months in 1873, equivalent to about 10 per cent. The highest of any that is shown there is in California, I believe, which is $13.39. Taking the whole of the years from 1869 to 1873, the average was very much below what the Senator has stated them; some of them as low as 5 per cent. and 4 per cent.

Mr. MORTON. That is semi-annually.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I accept the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania from his stand-point, but I am not to be diverted from the position I have taken. I cite specific banks and give their own statements. While I am on this point, as there seems to be a little sensitiveness upon it, I will give the rest of the figures and let the Senate and the country judge for themselves.

Now, I give the statement of a bank in the city of New York with a capital of $5,000,000, organized July 6, 1865. The amount paid as dividends is $3,700,000; the amount carried to the surplus fund $218,528; making the total net profits, $3,918,000, almost $4,000,000, upon a capital of five millions of money.

Mr. SHERMAN. For how many years?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Since 1865.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That would be about 10 per cent.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will give another from the city of New York that was organized in 1865. In that year it declared a semi-annual dividend of 5 per cent.; in 1866 a January dividend of 4 per cent. and a July dividend of 5 per cent.; in 1867 two semi-annual dividends of 5 per cent.; in 1868 the same; in 1869 the same; in 1870 two semi-annual dividends of 6 per cent.; in 1871 the same; in 1872 the same; in 1873 7½ per cent. semi-annually, and the dividend on the 1st of January last was 7½ per cent. I have added up these dividends and they average for the nine years, 11$\frac{5}{10}$ per cent. annually of declared dividends. In addition to that, they have run up a surplus profit to the capital of the bank amounting annually to 10½ per cent. more; making a total of 21$\frac{7}{10}$ per cent. annually of profit under this national banking system. I might give the name of this bank, although I prefer not to. I would not unnecessarily state the benefits of any bank. I wish to give facts to answer expressed doubts.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the Senator one question for information. Can he inform us what have been the average dividends of the banks of New York under the existing system, and what were the average dividends of the banks under the State system?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I could not tell the Senator at this moment, not having the data at hand.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it will be found that the difference is very small indeed. I know it is so in our State.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. That may be so. I have not the facts before me to state whether it is so or not. But I am clear in this, that whether the Senator from Rhode Island so regards it or not, the whole country will regard it that any system producing such beneficial results should either be made general or else the monopoly should be ended.

Now let me give the summary statement of this bank of which I have been speaking. Here is a bank with a capital of $1,500,000, and the dividends for each year and the surplus, after paying last January's dividend, amounts to $1,482,352.77—within $17,647.23 of doubling its capital in net profits during the time that it had been organized.

Mr. ANTHONY. How long?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The bank was organized January 1, 1865. Here is an average during nine years of 21.7 per cent. annually. Now I put that fact to the country. I was not disposed to bring it out at this time, but since it has been questioned, I will say that I have several other cases of the same sort in various States, proving the same general fact that I have stated—that under this banking system the profit is in excess of that obtained in the ordinary channels of business.

I have no more complaint to make of this than to say that what is good for the few should be made the right of the many.

If this be the case, I am surprised, and the country will be surprised, to see Senators here so tenacious for the perpetuation of this monopoly and so unwilling to grant the same benefits to other portions of the country. It cannot be denied that upon the broad basis of fair distribution justice is not done the West and the South. Take it under the national distribution, and what have we? We have here, as stated by the Comptroller of the Currency, a per capita of $31.15 of the national circulation in the New England States. In the Middle States the per capita is $12.80. In the South and Southwestern the per capita is $2.98. In the Western States the per capita is $7.11. In the United States per head the volume would be $9.18. Compared with the general circulation throughout the whole United States, the circulation of the New England States is 31 to 9; compared with the South, it is 31 to 2.98, and compared to the West, it is 31 to 7.11.

It is not strange therefore that the representatives of the Southern States join with those of the West on this floor on this subject and plead for justice. We simply ask that, and nothing more.

I wish to remind the chairman of the Committee on Finance at this point that when I proposed my remedy, I suggested but an increase of $50,000,000 of national currency, if that was to be the method of relief adopted, with the utilization of the $44,000,000 reserve, by making that a part of the permanent circulation. This reserve is now substantially out in the business channels of the country and is practically a part of the circulation. That being made a part of the permanent circulation, and $50,000,000 more of national currency being added, will make $800,000,000 as the volume of your circulation, and a per capita of twenty dollars. Is that too much, when England has twenty-five, and France thirty, as stated on the 1st of January, 1874, and they being upon a coin basis and we upon a currency basis? And yet when we ask simply for that per capita of currency circulation, we are denied, upon the plea that it is an attempt at expansion or inflation. I say that inflation is a misnomer. It is unjust to the equitable claim of the West to so denominate it. It is unjust to the Senators here who are demanding rights for their States and bound alike with others in the prosperity of the whole country. If you deny one section its just rights, you impoverish your own. If you will not give us that, then we are placed in the West with no adequate means to develop its resources, and my friend at my back [Mr. WADLEIGH] will be compelled to call back such as his State has sent there, as he says, to populate the West, if you persist in denying them the means to benefit themselves and the nation.

But, Mr. President, if this is to be the test question, I am willing to waive, for the time, my first choice, for I stated in the opening of the debate, on the fourth day of this session, that while I suggested from a business stand-point a plan by which we could have a permanent and successful medium of exchanges, I was willing to yield to any other plan that would prove more remedial. While I am at the outset opposed to the increase of the national currency, believing that the Government should issue the currency itself, and save the eighteen to twenty millions of coin interest annually which we are paying upon our bonds that underlie your national circulation, I would let the Government issue the whole volume of circulation, and save that coin to the people. Yet if I cannot get that, I will take the next best thing, and join in an increase of the currency to the amount of $50,000,000 more. We cannot get along with less. Give us that amount, and we shall then be placed in a measure upon a par with other States. That will be simple justice and nothing more.

Mr. STEWART. The bill under consideration, which proposes to equalize the banking capital, may be very well in some respects. If you take into consideration the fact that the States are allowed to tax the banking capital, and that some States which have the means of organizing banks, without the privilege of doing so, have not their fair share, there may be an injustice in that. It may be a profit to the States to tax them, and if the banking circulation is not equally distributed, and some States have the capacity to take their share but cannot get it, there may be an injustice in that. Therefore this bill may be very well; but I cannot, for my life, understand the arguments that are adduced here by southern and western Senators to the effect that they will have more money if we issue more paper; that it will make money plentier in the West and South. The more you issue, the more you inflate the currency, the less money you will have there. That is very evident to anybody who will give this subject a moment's consideration. The money will go where the surplus profits are. Money will go in any country to that point where the surplus profits accumulate. The people who speculate in this currency live in New York, and they make their millions and hundreds of millions of surplus every year by speculating in your fluctuating currency. The money goes there because the surplus is made there. The gold board produces its millionaires every year by speculating in your fluctuating currency. By means of this currency you give them a chance to make money. Money accumulates in New York, where the speculators are. Through their operations it fluctuates and is rendered uncertain. The farmer cannot keep track of it; the producer cannot keep track of it. They keep track of him. They know exactly when his crop is to be harvested; they know his necessities; they know when he must have his necessaries, and they know how to make money tight or loose just to suit their convenience and to cramp him. These vast accumulations in the cities are made by means of the speculation which your depreciated currency affords the opportunity to carry out.

The farmer buys his products and his materials and gets into debt at the time when money is easy, in the winter, when greenbacks are cheap, and he buys in New York on that basis. He is bound to sell when there is a stringency and greenbacks are scarce. He loses in this transaction every year 5 or 6 per cent. Five per cent. is a pretty good profit. If the farmer of the West were making 5 per cent. net every year, the money would go West whether the national banks were there or not, because he would be accumulating all the time. But he cannot make that. The middle-men who insure themselves against these fluctuations, the persons who put gold up and put it down in order to make money out of this uncertainty, make the money. The farmer gets into debt every year.

Allusion has been made to the enormous amount of profit made by the national banks. A large amount of the profits made by the national banks is due to the fluctuating character of the currency. It enables the men who deal in money, who deal in this fluctuating article, to make large sums, to charge high rates of interest, to take advantage of the necessities of the country. The men who devote themselves to the study of this uncertainty and speculation are going to reap the harvest. Your harvests are now moved from the West to the money centers. Your hundreds and thousands of speculators who deal in money are the only people that have a surplus profit, and wherever they live there will be a plethora of money every year when they desire to have it. After they have reaped their harvest, after they have gathered in the grain of the West, you will have a plethora in New York from their speculations.

If you issue more paper money it will only make more fluctuations; it will only make the harvest in Wall street a little larger next year, and make the margin against the farmer a little larger, and bring him more heavily into debt. Every time you issue more money and make more uncertainty, you make more distress on the part of the producers, and you give the speculators a greater chance.

The only way to relieve the country is to move right back to specie payments; let every man in the country know what the value of his money is; leave no margins to put up gold or to put down gold, to put up greenbacks or to put down greenbacks as compared with gold; leave no speculations of that kind. Let everybody know what a dollar is worth. Then the man who goes West to buy produce will be under no necessity to insure himself against the fluctuations of the currency. He can pay the full value of the wheat then without the fear that a change in the price of gold will break him down before he gets back to New York. The farmer then will know how to measure the difference in price between his wheat in Illinois and the wheat in Liverpool. It will be the transportation and the necessary commissions, without any insurance on account of a fluctuating currency. The wheat will be measured by the same standard—gold—in Illinois as it is in Liverpool, and any man can figure it up. But now it is a mystery; the whole subject of finance is a mystery; and what do we see every day? We see those who devote their attention to it making large fortunes out of this mystery. Let us do as all the people of the world have been doing from the beginning, measure our values by gold, adopt the standard that all can understand, and get rid of this mystery.

Mr. LOGAN. What does the Senator want?

Mr. STEWART. I want the standard gold, and no paper money not redeemable in gold; no paper money the value of which is not ascertained; no paper money that will organize a gold board to speculate in it. Who pays for this gold board? Who pays these immense fortunes? How is it that millions and millions can be rolled up annually there? Did anybody ever calculate who paid for it? It comes out of the producers. How do those men exist? By the latitude which your depreciated currency gives to speculation, and nothing else.

I will vote for this bill on the principle that if any of these Western States have bonds that they can put up, and desire to go into the banking business, the States ought to have it, because it is of local advantage in taxation. The taxation is important to them.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Any question.

Mr. LOGAN. Can he conceive no difference between paying interest at home and paying interest abroad?

Mr. STEWART. At one time you pay in New York and at another in London, and there are three or four thousand miles between the places; that is all.

Mr. LOGAN. I will put my question in this shape: Suppose your State borrows $50,000,000 at 10 per cent. from Connecticut, and it runs for ten years, can the Senator see no difference between borrowing that money from Connecticut and borrowing it at home?

Mr. STEWART. I can see the difference of about three thousand miles between Nevada and Connecticut.

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose anybody will see that by measurement. I may be so dull that probably I cannot put the question; but my point is this: In ten years the interest would amount to $50,000,000. If you pay the $50,000,000 in Connecticut, you take it out of the material wealth of your own State and transfer it to another; whereas if you pay it at home there are $50,000,000 more in your own State. There is the difference.

Mr. STEWART. I can see what the effect will be if there is a machine whereby the people of Connecticut, without producing anything, by speculating in money, can draw out all we can raise in Nevada. It just increases the chances of the people of Connecticut to speculate in money, that is all it does, and the people of Nevada have got to pay for it if it be in Nevada.

Mr. LOGAN. What is the matter with them?

Mr. STEWART. The matter with them is that they are not making any money; somebody else is making the money. Persons who are speculating in your depreciated currency are making the money, and they will continue to do so as long as you have a depreciated currency. The country and the world know that. You would throw out of employment the hundreds of thousands of speculators who are dealing in this one thing, and who are making more money than all your farmers, if you would establish a certain currency that the country can understand.

This is simply a plea for those who desire to speculate. It is a plea in behalf of the speculators and against the producers. The farmer can never take advantage of the money market; he can never take advantage of these speculations; he has got to lose his 5 or 10 per cent. every year, and will continue to do so for all time to come until we get back to a specie basis. Every country has found that a depreciated currency was attended with evils all the time, and it has been the purpose of every country to relieve themselves of it as speedily as possible. Our country is able and strong enough to-day to do the same. Let us do it, and then we shall have some measure of value that the farmer can compute, that the miner can compute, that any man can compute. It will then be no mystery. It will not be, "Now you see it, and now you don't." It will not be Wall street making money tight to-day and loose to-morrow; putting up the price of money, and speculating on the difference between your circulating medium and gold. As it is now, the gold board, and those who trade in your currency, are making more money than all the farmers of the country.

The way to get money in the West is to have a square deal that the people can understand, so that they can sell their products and get the whole amount for them that they are worth, deducting simply the cost of transportation and the legitimate commission, which anybody can calculate if they have not this mystery to go through. Money cannot go to the West unless they are making money; for this fluctuating currency allows the speculators to make all the money, and the money accumulates in their hands. Of course the money accumulates where the surplus earnings are. The surplus earnings now consist in the skill to calculate chances and make corners, in order to oppress the producing classes. The only men who are getting rich in this country are those who have skill enough to manipulate this fluctuating currency, and nobody else can make any money. They make their hundreds of millions per annum, which were formerly made by the farmers themselves. If the farmers would get rich, they have got to become skilled in this fluctuating currency and make corners and manipulate the market; and if they do that, they cannot farm. It is a science, and it has got the smartest men in the world in it, and they are making all the money that is made in America. I hope that there will be no more issues of greenbacks, on the plea that it is going to help the producers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think, Mr. President, that until New England ceases to produce more maple-sugar and more pretty girls than the other States we shall not escape reproach in this Chamber. Here is a bill just presented merely to slightly amend a law passed three or four years ago, in order to enable the Comptroller of the Currency to put it into practical operation, and what do we see? The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] very properly comes forth here as the leader of the expansionists, and tells us at once that that will not be satisfactory; if that is all we can do, it is not enough. Of course I have been in favor of this bill as a final settlement of the vexed question. I expected to see it pass quietly and without debate. I have become suspicious that there was not entire sincerity among all those urging this bill from the discussion that has taken place.

The Senator from Indiana discards all theories of the past, and not only all theories, but all practice, and he quotes Bacon as authority that the great mischief of the world was that there was too much theory; and there is too much theory now in relation to finance, according to the Senator from Indiana; and yet at the very moment that he quoted that doctrine he comes forth with a new theory himself, a theory that is based upon the idea of issuing paper money without any metallic basis, and as my friend from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] says, without any system of redemption also. I do not suppose that the Senator from Indiana can get a patent upon that idea; there will be rivals and competitors for it; but I undertake to say that he will not find it very profitable to undertake to get a patent for it in any other country than this; it will not be accepted elsewhere.

Mr. MORTON. What theory did I advance?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Well, it may do in Cuba, or Hayti, or some such places; but since the foundation of commerce and civilization the idea of a metallic basis has been established the world over.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator of course does not intend to misrepresent me. What I said about that to-day was that there were periods in the history of every nation when it was impossible to maintain specie payments, and that then irredeemable paper was the only thing. I referred to the period of our war, when an attempt to maintain specie payments would have destroyed the power of the Government. I said that we can only approach specie payments as we get away from the consequences and the burdens of that war. I said distinctly, as I have said on different occasions, that the normal condition of the country, when the country itself was in a normal condition, was paper redeemable in specie. I have always said that. I believe there is no mystery about that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes, sir; and we are eight years from the close of the war, and further off than we were the day the war closed from specie resumption. We are three or four years past the time of the passage of this act, and the Senator is less satisfied with it to-day than at the time of its passage.

The Senator from Indiana proclaimed the fact that speculation has built thirty-five thousand miles of railroad, and then he proclaims the doctrine that he is for having speculation go on. Has the Senator not read the document of Mr. Bancroft, certainly the ablest historian of our country yet produced, now our minister in Germany, wherein he states that there are fifty-eight of these railroads that to-day have suspended payment and do not pay their coupons or dividends, which are held to the amount of about $80,000,000 in Germany? Is that the kind of speculation the Senator is for? There is no power which can at present revive this sort of speculation.

But, Mr. President, it is obvious that the plain intent and meaning of this act is not desired at the present moment. The purpose of the Senator from Indiana—and I would not do him injustice—is to apply the thumb-screw to New England, and when they shall be tired of the application of that so that they will consent to inflation, then they can have relief from this transfer of so much banking capital from the East to the West.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a remark?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator says I want to apply the thumb-screw to New England, when I have said upon all occasions that I did not want to take a dollar from New England. I agree to the propriety of the remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] upon that subject. What I asked was, that the West and the South should have their needs and wants supplied; but I have never begrudged New England a dollar. I am as good a friend as she has on this floor. I do not blame her for taking what she took. When the Comptroller here allowed her to take that currency, I did not blame her for taking it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes; but the Senator says he is in favor of inflation, of a further expansion of the currency, and not getting that, he demands this and more; and he gives us notice—I will not call it a threat, but he serves notice—that this will not be sufficient; that the Western States are growing from day to day in wants and in power, and that the difference will be more next year than this.

Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the discussion upon this subject. I was entirely willing that this bill should pass if it would silence complaint. I was willing to amend the law so that it could be practically operative at once. We have the testimony of the Comptroller of the Currency that this amount will be sufficient for two years; but in order to accomplish the ends of expansion Senators here are unwilling to wait and let the occasion slip, but they propose to seize upon this as the opportune moment, as it seems to them, to obtain what they so much more desire, and that is expansion.

The Senator from Indiana begs for justice, and says it is rather mortifying—or some similar phrase to that—to come here begging for simple justice. Was there any injustice in the way this banking privilege was obtained by the States that now have it? Were they not importuned to take it? Take, for instance, the bank in Boston that will be most largely affected by this curtailment of the currency, the Merchants' Bank of Boston. I happen to know something about it. It was the leading institution of New England. Secretary Chase was very desirous that that bank should lead off in order to give the national banking system a prestige and that other banks might follow; and they did so. Now, was there anything wrong in their doing that? Was it not at a moment when the country needed it? And yet it is a reproach to us, according to the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] that the people of New England did not furnish as many men as the West, and therefore ought to have their banking privileges curtailed. Did they not furnish as many in proportion to the number of able-bodied men as the West? I know that my State did. It furnished much more than its quota. It seems to be a reproach, then, that some of our men are more aged than western men, and that we have more women than men, a small number more—making our quota of able-bodied men less according to population—and that is brought in here as an argument in relation to this question of finance.

Mr. President, one other statement was made here in regard to the profits of banking. Any banker knows that it is not the system of banking that we have in operation that causes a bank to make great profits. It is the profits on the amount of deposits that are made in the banks which enable them to make large dividends. If a bank is located where there is a large amount of capital, and there is a large amount of deposits, of course they make much larger profits than when it is otherwise.

There is another question that was mooted yesterday, and that was in relation to taxation. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] claimed that the Government contributed something to the taxation of these States in this banking system. Now, let us illustrate that point by supposing that here is a State that has $1,000,000 in United States bonds. They are held by private parties. Of course, then, they are not taxed at all, let them be in whatever State they may; but if the capital is in other resources, other means, so that they have to dispose of property in order to obtain means to invest in bonds, it is taxed, and when it is invested in banking it will be taxed still, so that the Government contributes nothing. It is the business of the bank that is subjected to the tax, whether the bank itself pays it in gross, or whether it is taxed upon individual holders of the stock, as it is in some States.

So far as the application of the subject to New England is concerned, as one of the humblest representatives of New England I will say that there is no application of the screw that would make me consent to what I think is detrimental to the interests and the honor of the country, and I do regard the idea of inflating our currency with infinite dread. I do not deny the honesty and integrity of the conviction of others who differ from me, but it is my profound conviction that it is against the interests of our country at this moment to have a further increase of the currency. I believe that the interests of my own people will not be subserved by it, but I would scorn to consult exclusively the interests of the State I have the honor in part to represent. I am here to legislate for the whole of the United States, and I am to look to see what the effect of a measure will be upon the whole country. The basis of the prosperity of our country is the agricultural interest. That, as it happens, is the chief interest of my State, as it is of the State of the Senator from Indiana, and I know that the agricultural people of my State are getting no more for what they have to sell of their surplus products than they got before the currency was so immensely inflated, and yet that they have to pay much more for labor and for everything that they consume. I say that we have reduced the profits of farming to the very minimum rate, and the system of expansion of paper money will increase that reduction; and therefore I dread it.

Mr. HOWE. I want to add one other word to this debate, especially with a view of getting an understanding with my friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] He expresses a little doubt as to whether the West and South are serious in asking for this measure. For one, I desire to say, if I have a right to speak for either one of those sections at all——

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have a right to speak for every section of the country.

Mr. HOWE. I do not ask for it. And, assured by my friend from Vermont, who sits right before me, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] that I have a right to speak for every section of the country, I think I can repeat, with a good deal more confidence, that I do not know of any demand which has come from any portion of the West, or any portion of the South, for this particular measure. Those portions of the country have felt that your present banking system did not do them justice, and did not permit justice to be done them. The particular points in which this injustice was done have been specified over and over again. Still the law was formed when it was and as it was. There was a limit fixed to the privilege of banking; there was a provision made for distributing these limited privileges, and I am told that that was disregarded by an officer. But the law did the first wrong, I think, in fixing a limit; the officer did the second wrong. But it was our misfortune, perhaps, not our fault certainly, that we had not as much unused capital at that time as some other portions of the country; and therefore to-day we find that of these facilities, these limited facilities, a much larger proportion is enjoyed by our friends on the Atlantic coast than by those in the West or in the South. For myself, and I think I can speak for every western representative, that never for one moment has been held up as a reproach against the East. We have made no complaint against the East.

Mr. MORTON. Not in the least.

Mr. HOWE. We complain of the law. We ask you to extend equal facilities to other portions of the country. We do not expect the East to follow up their sons with money. I came from the East myself. I emigrated from New England once into the West. New England has never sent a dollar to take care of me since I went from there, and I do not expect New England ever will. When I cannot take care of myself in the West, I will return to the East like other prodigals, not doubting that I shall have a calf killed when I get back. [Laughter.]

But, sir, somehow or other, not because of any demand from the West, the Committee on Finance have felt moved to do something to correct this injustice which has existed in your banking laws. The particular thing they propose to do is, as I expressed it earlier in the day, to grab twenty-five millions from existing banks and to redistribute it simply among new banks in the West and in the South. That comes pretty near being the law now; not exactly the law, because it cannot be enforced, but it is an idea that occurred to certain statesmen some years ago; they undertook to put it into law, but did not quite achieve it, as existing officers think, and this is proposed to make it perfect. Now, if you think it right to do that; if, rather than extend banking facilities, or any accommodation, or any terms whatever, you think it better to hold the limit just where it is, to take from Peter to pay Paul, to snatch from New England to endow the West and the South, why do so; I shall consent to the endowment.

Mr. ANTHONY. You do not quote the proverb right; it is "rob," not "take." [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. Well, if you prefer to rob Peter in order to pay Paul, do so. I do not like to engage in the robbery, but I will accept. [Laughter.] But I want to say to my friend from Vermont that I expect you to do this like gentlemen, and to allow us to accept the provisions of this measure as gentlemen. I have no objection to bow in acknowledgment of this late recognition of right. I do not want to courtesy for it, because it is not any more than justice. Every Senator who sits on this floor knows that it does not begin to do justice. Therefore, do not tax us with it; do not charge us for it; do not reproach us with it; it is your proposition, not our demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I will detain the Senate but a few moments on this amendment, because I wish to get a vote. I believe there is an almost universal concurrence that something should be done to equalize the circulation of bank paper. The New England States sometimes feel that it is hard for the Western States to call for the transfer of circulation from the banks organized in those States to the West. So far as my own State is concerned, we are entirely passive. The State of Ohio has about its fair proportion, and there is no pressure that I am aware of for any increase of bank circulation there. I look upon it, therefore, dispassionately; but, to my mind, it is perfectly just, perfectly right, and perfectly fair, that the West should seek to have the original law which provided for a fair distribution of this bank circulation carried out according to its intent and purpose. This always seemed to me perfectly fair and just.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question just there?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather not be interrupted.

The original banking act provided that the amount of bank-note circulation should not exceed $300,000,000. It provided that one-half of it should be apportioned according to population, and the other half according to wealth, industry, production, &c. That was the original provision of the banking law. In process of time, however, this provision was disregarded, and the result was a large disproportion in favor of some of the States that organized national banks, or converted their existing State banks into national institutions during the war and immediately after the war, because most of this increase occurred after the war was over; and so there is no question of patriotism involved. Up to the close of the war there had been no violation of the principle of distribution; but immediately after the war was over there was a large and rapid influx of the New England banks into this system, and the barrier which had been erected was broken over. Under this course of action the State of Rhode Island received banking circulation to the amount of sixty-one dollars per inhabitant—more than double what it ever had before. My friend says they had no more circulation in 1860 than they have now.

Mr. ANTHONY. The capital was what I spoke about; not the circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill does not affect the question of capital.

Mr. ANTHONY. But we cannot have bank capital unless we have it under the national system.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me go on. This bill does not affect the capital of the banks of Rhode Island one particle. It will not diminish the capital of the banks of Rhode Island one cent. They can have now banking capital to the amount of $100,000,000 if they choose. The question is about the distribution of circulating notes. I need not refer to the books to show my honorable friend that Rhode Island never had up to 1862 but a little over $6,000,000 of bank circulation. She had a larger amount of bank capital, but her maximum circulation at any time in her whole history was $6,300,000. I have the documents here, if it is necessary to refer to them. Now, she has $13,800,000.

Mr. HOWE. And then her circulation was not limited by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; then she could have as much circulation as she chose. Then Rhode Island never had over $6,300,000, and now she has more than twice that. So with Massachusetts. Massachusetts never had over $29,000,000 of bank circulation before the war; now she has $58,506,686. Massachusetts has doubled her circulation over what she had before when she had the whole power and control over it.

This is the condition of affairs. Certain States that have not got as much as the law allows them, that want to organize banks, say that they have capital, and money to buy bonds and organize banks, and desire to have the benefits of a local circulation; their citizens desire to have the benefit of taxing the capital invested in banks, and all the other incidental benefits. They desire to have local circulation; they desire the organization of banks. It is a great benefit to a locality to have banks. Senators may deny it as much as they please, but it is a great advantage. In the first place, that bank capital contributes to the local taxation, not only of the State, but of the county, and the city, or town; and therefore it is always a great advantage to any community, however flourishing, to have one or more banks for local advantage; and this local advantage the people of the Western States and the Southern States naturally desire. When they come with their money and bonds, and make a formal application to the Comptroller of the Currency for bank circulation, they are met, not with the law, because the law says they are entitled to a certain proportion, but they are met with the fact that the limit of bank circulation has been reached. They say, "But the limit of this circulation has been violated as to other States;" and they show that in their State there are but three or four dollars, or five dollars, per inhabitant, while in Rhode Island there are sixty-one dollars, and in Massachusetts forty-eight dollars. This is a local grievance that has been a subject of constant complaint. It is so great a complaint, that the democratic candidate for President, Mr. Seymour, perambulated the Western States when he was making speeches for himself as a presidential candidate, and made that distribution by the republican party the chief element of his accusations against the republican party in 1868.

Mr. MORTON. Almost the only topic.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. Although one of his own constituents in the State of New York gave rise to this trouble, he made that a ground of local complaint, and he said at Cleveland, I remember, that this republican party had rendered all its favors to New England and the East, while it denied to the West equal advantages and privileges; and he brought up this very thing as a grievance. That did not make any impression on our people so far as their voting was concerned. They voted right; they voted for General Grant; but still there has been a lingering feeling that as long as the Western and Southern States desire the organization of new banks they ought to have that privilege until they reach the amount fixed by law.

I have always thought that my friend from Indiana had no great right to complain about this matter, because Indiana has very nearly her proportion of the amount according to any distribution that could be made; but certainly Western States like Illinois and Missouri, and Wisconsin and Iowa, and all the Southern States, have a ground of complaint. So far as Indiana and Ohio are concerned, we are practically on a footing of equality—we have got about our proportion. Ohio has a little more deficiency than Indiana.

I say this ought to be corrected. It is no great injury to Rhode Island or to the banks of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, the withdrawing from them this amount of circulation. Indeed, I have heard their own bank officers say they are perfectly willing to surrender it in order to satisfy this local demand. And why? Under the principles of this bill what injury is done? The Comptroller issues an order calling on a bank with over $300,000—because this bill only operates on banks having a circulation of over $300,000—to return $10,000 of their circulating notes; and if they do not do it, then the bonds that are filed to secure those circulating notes are sold, and with the proceeds of the sale of these particular circulating notes, are redeemed and canceled; and then there is ground made for issuing circulating notes to banks in the West and South. What harm is done?

My friend from Rhode Island says the profits of circulation are only between 1 and 2 per cent.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose that is about the estimate. The Senator from Ohio knows better than I do, however.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator is about right. The profit of the circulation of bank-notes in New England is not over 1, 2, or 3 per cent.; certainly not over 3 per cent. Now, all that this bank in Rhode Island loses is its profit on a part of its circulation; its capital is not impaired; its profits are not injured. All it loses is the infinitesimal sums of the profits of circulation on those notes withdrawn from New England in order to start local banks in the West and South. It should not be a matter of complaint; and by no possibility can this reduction go forward so as to do injustice to those States or reduce them below their full maximum of circulation.

As I have said, this proposition does not affect any bank with a circulation under $300,000. To say that this is a plain measure, that ought to be adopted promptly and gracefully, I think is not saying too much.

A good deal has been said here about the profits of banks. My friend from Michigan, I think, did an act of injustice by endeavoring to show that by a monopoly the national banks make a great deal of money. Well, sir, the most profitable banks in this country are banks without circulation, strange as it may seem. I have a statement here that was handed to me while the Senator was speaking. I will not give the names of particular banks, but there is one bank in the city of New York with a capital of $300,000 that has now surplus profits of $1,000,000 and not one dollar of circulation. I know the bank. It is a bank that has immense deposits, and that is the explanation of its great profits. It is conducted with great sagacity. The people have confidence in it, and the bank makes money out of their deposits, and would not have circulation.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I would ask the Senator if that is a national bank?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a national bank.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Then it has the prestige of the national-bank system.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has deposits given to it by people who do not care whether it is a national bank or not. They trust it because they know it is well conducted. There is another bank in the city of New York with a capital of $1,000,000, organized July 17, 1865, that did not take any circulation at all, that has now a surplus of $1,000,000. As a rule, the banks of the largest profits in the city of New York are those with the least circulation; and the banks that are affected by this law, whose circulation would be diminished by the operations of this bill, do not care one fig about it; not one word of remonstrance will come against this law from them. The profits of city banks are not derived from circulation; they are derived from deposits. So as to the profits of national banks; my friend can pick out here and there a case and show that the profits have gone up as high as 17 per cent., but the Comptroller of the Currency shows you by giving all the banks of the United States, taking the average, the profits have been 10 per cent. on capital, or about 9 per cent. on capital and surplus, which is perhaps rather more than the ordinary average of other business. But if by taking out isolated cases you show that these banks derive an undue profit, you might as well take the case of Mr. Stewart, of New York, and show that the retail dry-goods trade is the most profitable trade in the world, because there is a man who, from comparative poverty, has made an immense fortune in the retail trade; and yet the fact is that 98 per cent. of all the men who have engaged in that business have failed. You cannot take isolated cases, but you must take the general average.

The operation of this bill, then, to come back to it, is simply to carry into execution the provision in regard to the $25,000,000 in the act of 1870. My friend from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] it seems to me unnecessarily, proposes to increase this to $75,000,000. Suppose you put in a provision for $75,000,000; is it at all probable from any facts before us that any more than $25,000,000 will be called for in a year or two? I do not think it is. I regard the amendment, therefore, as rather threatening to do that which probably will not be done. I can vote for this bill whether the amendment be adopted or not, but it seems to me that, while it will hold a threat over these banks which they need not fear, at the same time it will strike them in terror and may prevent them from discounting as freely as they otherwise would do.

It is a great deal better to provide merely for the present exigency. This is, it is true, as my friend from Indiana says, only a half-way measure. It was not intended for anything else. It is a measure to relieve an exigency, to put in operation an existing law. Now is it not better to treat it as such? When you come to the great question that lies beyond this measure, whether we shall issue more paper money without any scheme whatever for redemption, then you come to a question about which men can honestly differ, about which a great deal that has been said here to-day might be said. I would rather see these banks sunk into Tophet, every one of them, than embark this country into the sea of illimitable paper money. There is a danger there lying back of this. But, sir, this measure, it seems to me, ought to be adopted in the spirit in which it has been introduced, simply as a measure to meet an exigency, to meet a local complaint, to give relief to certain sections of the country that now complain of a want of local circulation; and therefore I shall vote against the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, although I think even if it were adopted it is not at all probable that any considerable number of banks would be organized in the West and South under it. I will say, in answer to my friend from Wisconsin, that I do it not because I fear it, but simply because I do not think it is well to hold up to the New England States, who will be affected mainly by the operations of the law, a threat to interfere to the large extent of $75,000,000 with their local circulation. That is all.

Now, I want to show precisely to the Senate the States on which this law will operate. It so happens that the whole of this surplus circulation is concentrated in the New England States and in the Middle States to a very small extent comparatively. The excess in the Middle States—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland—is only $9,000,000, while the excess in the New England States is $70,690,000, and Massachusetts alone has more than half the whole. I know my friend from Massachusetts will agree with me when I state it as the opinion of many of the ablest financiers in Massachusetts, they would prefer to have the whole of the surplus taken at once from them than embark this country in a scheme of irredeemable paper money.

Mr. SUMNER. Unquestionably. There is nothing so bad as that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now let me go one step further. I have here a table prepared upon this subject of paper money. My friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and my friend from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to-day were talking constantly about the people of the United States being entitled to have as much money as those of any other country. Now here is a table taken from the highest official standard of the amount of paper money; I confine myself now to paper money. The amount of paper money in this country is greater far than in any other country in the world. In Great Britain the amount of paper money is only $254,642,000, and of that over £12,000,000 sterling, or $60,000,000, are held as reserve. In France the amount of paper money is $599,504,000, and the amount held in reserve of this identical money is 720,000,000 francs, or nearly $150,000,000; and the legal limit fixed in France for the amount of paper money is 3,200,000,000 francs, and they are now discussing the proposition of reducing this limit lest they may pass the bound when paper might be maintained at par in gold; and yet the whole amount is now only $599,000,000.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Can the Senator state the proportion in France of paper money to coin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon that subject I have here an official document from Dr. Linderman, and I will say that no living man can state that; but I will not introduce it now, because it will come in future discussions.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Is not the paper money largely in excess of coin in France?

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] says not. I am rather inclined to think they are on the same footing. The Senator from Illinois claimed the amount of gold and silver in France to be $700,000,000, and consequently there is more specie in France, according to the claim of the Senator from Illinois, than paper money, though I differ with him.

Mr. LOGAN. I took that from very good authority, and it made the entire currency of France about $1,300,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amount in Germany, being reduced to dollars, is $392,000,000 of paper money. In any statement that I have before me I have not the amount of their reserve. In the United States we have now outstanding $783,587,462 of paper money, and the whole of it that is held in reserve is $4,000,000 in the Treasury. The only reserve that is now held for United States notes is $4,000,000 out of the whole mass of our paper money in United States notes; and the whole amount held by the banks before the panic had affected them in the least was $92,347,000, and during the panic that whole reserve practically disappeared, except in the Western States. So we have now in this country $783,000,000 of paper money, or an amount nearly equal to that in Great Britain, France, and Germany combined. Austria, another paper-money country, has $172,655,000 of paper; Belgium, $67,640,000.

The idea of issuing more paper money without any plan of redemption, without any promise of redemption, it seems to me is the wildest lunacy—I cannot think of it in any other light—deranging values, disordering everything. Why, sir, I would see these banks sunk out of sight forever rather than embark in such a scheme; and I frankly say to you that I believe that this complaint throughout the West and South of what they call a local and undue advantage now possessed by the New England States, which prevents them from establishing in their own communities convenient facilities for exchange, tends very much to create a feeling of injustice, which begets the spirit that desires more paper money. So far as my own State is concerned, there is, no doubt, a feeling for more money. There is everywhere, and in every portion of the country. But they want good money; they want money that is redeemable in something that has a fixed standard of value; and with that kind of money it does not make much difference how much paper is authorized, if only the issue is restrained by the power of redemption. But, sir, I will not go into any such discussion. I only make these statements in reply to some observations that have been made.

I assure Senators that the whole object of this bill is to supply for the present a local demand for bank paper and for local banks in certain communities to the extent of $25,000,000. If, however, the Senate chooses to make this bill a cover for a new scheme entirely for the redistribution of bank circulation, I cannot see that it will do anybody any great harm, because these new banks can only be established as the capital is furnished and the circulation withdrawn from existing institutions. In my judgment it is better to stand by the law as it is and make only provision for the case we have in hand, the case of carrying into effect the law of 1870, and remove the $25,000,000 now authorized by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the question which I wished to ask the honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, was to be good enough to point out to the Senate where the law is which he says has been violated, or not obeyed, in the case of the banks of Rhode Island taking so much of the banking facilities of the country as they did at the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is the act of March 3, 1865. There were two laws passed on the same day. I do not desire to go into a long explanation, but I can do so. There were two laws passed on the same day, one re-establishing the old principle of distribution and the other giving banks in existence a priority. The construction I have always put on these two acts, when taken together, was that the old banks should have a priority in the distribution of the part assigned to the State. It was the construction of those two laws that led to this unequal distribution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be worth while for any Senator who wishes to do justice, if he bases his notion of justice upon what these banks did, in having violated or not conformed to a law through the action of the Treasury Department of the United States, to be a little careful to see the law, and point it out, which it is said they have violated. I have searched the act of 1863, which was the first act which provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should make a certain distribution. The seventeenth section of the act of 1863 provided that $150,000,000 of the $300,000,000 of bank circulation—

> Shall be apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, according to representative population, and the remainder shall be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury among associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of such States, District, and Territories.

That was the act of the 25th of February, 1863. That act was repealed by the act of the 3d of June, 1864, upon the same subject. If I am not right in that, I beg the honorable Senator from Ohio to correct me now.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was repealed, or the new law covered the whole subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The new law covered the whole subject, and repealed by implication, if not by an express clause, which I believe is in it, the act of 1863. The new law was passed on the 3d of June, 1864, when the Government was in infinite distress for money, when the money that it wanted was in the pockets of its owners, the people who were entitled to it, chiefly in the Eastern States—and that is no reproach to the West or South; I beg nobody to misunderstand me about it—but the money was in the hands of the people, who or whose fathers had earned it by honest industry; and, according to our scheme of civilization, when we get a universal currency that is based on nothing, we shall change that, probably; I hope so, because to be consistent we should do so. It could not be taken, without his consent, from the citizen, who was the proprietor of it and who had earned it, except by regular taxation, in the regular way. Under this act of 1864 nine-tenths of the present banks in New England were organized, or changed themselves from State to national banks. This act allowed anybody who would come forward, the citizens of this common country of ours, anywhere, to take the bonds of the Government and to give it cash for them to pay the soldiers, for supplies and for services, and to keep up the credit of the Government in that period of, what I call justly, infinite distress of the year 1864, when it seemed as if the bottom of the Republic had fallen out, before the re-election of Mr. Lincoln; when it seemed as if the courage and endurance of our brothers at the South, wrong as they were, would overmaster all the wealth and the power of the North in self-defense, as they were defending themselves, holding territory against invasion, which is quite a different thing from invading, as we all know. Then, I say, the representatives of the nation here declared to the banks of Rhode Island, of Massachusetts, and of every other State, and to the people who had money, "If you will lend us money and take our bonds for it, you may establish banks and give proper security for the redemption of your bills, and issue bills according to the amount you take." The law, therefore, was not violated; it was not ignored by the banks or the citizens of New England, of the East, or the Middle States, or the West, when they came forward to aid the distress of the Government and advance the capital which they had honestly earned and honestly held to meet the necessities of the Government, and took for it the Government bonds according to the contract to which the faith of the nation was pledged.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you refer to the act of March 3, 1865?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am really very sorry to be interrupted by my honorable friend. I am afraid he will really disturb the tenor of my discourse. I am not accustomed to being interrupted; and if he will pardon me, I would rather go on, because I might forget what I was wishing to say. [Laughter.]

Then, Mr. President, in the summer of 1864, when the dire crisis of this strife was upon us, and when your Treasury was empty and you were appealing to every citizen who had a dollar in his pocket to lend it to the Government, you came to those who had money—if that was a sin they ought to have been hanged for it perhaps, as some people who were fighting the Government in the southern country it was said ought to have been; but if it was not a sin you came to the people who had money and said to them, "If you will take our bonds and give us your money, you may use the bonds for this very purpose, and to that our faith is pledged in the public act of Congress which we have provided for it." Then the money was advanced; then the State banks changed their organization from State banks to national banks, as they did in my State. We had State banks enough; we were not asking the Government for such facilities. We had such a circulation that whenever we had occasion to buy anything, the dollar of a Vermont State bank would pass for a dollar in gold, because it was redeemable in gold by the State law and in nothing else, for we had not got so far advanced in financial and social notions as to believe that a paper dollar payable in another paper dollar was as good as a dollar note payable in gold. That probably was a delusion of ours, but we thought so. So we had a currency that was perfect and perfectly secure, and that represented a gold basis.

Mr. President, in order to uphold the Union, and to defend its interests, and to keep the Government of the United States from going into bankruptcy and dissolution for want of money to buy its supplies and pay its soldiers, the State banks of Vermont and the capitalists of Vermont, if you call people who have earned a few thousand dollars capitalists, the farmers everywhere who make up the stockholders of our banks, advanced their money, took your bonds, changed their banks, withdrew their own circulation upon the faith of this act.

Now, I shall be glad to know upon what system of ethics it is that any Senator turns around and says to the people of my State, or the people of Massachusetts, or Rhode Island, or of Ohio, or of anywhere, that we were in that violating any law or acting outside of the authority of law. They were accepting, as people who were to lend money to the Government, the proposition that the representatives of the nation here advanced to them to take their money upon those terms. Now you undertake to turn around, in 1865 or 1866, and say, "Whatever may have been the truth about that, having now got your money and you having got our bonds, we choose to say to you that you shall surrender your money and take back our bonds;" not "take back your money that you gave for them," which was a money equal to gold, because it was redeemable in gold; not "take back your State circulation," founded upon the solid fact of a metallic basis in the end, but "you shall take back the bonds which you gave us, and give up the currency which we gave you. We will rescind that part of the contract at our will, but we will not rescind it in toto as courts of equity require parties to rescind, and give you back your money and you give up your bonds, and leave us both as we were before; but you shall take back the bonds which you have lent us the money upon and hold them, and we will keep your money; and the other part of the contract, by which it was expected you would get some advantage for lending the money to us, we will repudiate," because there is no other word that defines exactly what that transaction was, "and we will then send this money to some other part of the country for the time being, and when the time comes we will treat them in the same way."

Mr. President, I do not think it right to say that to the people of Rhode Island, or of Vermont, or of Massachusetts; though as to Vermont, she stands entirely indifferent about this, for she is not affected by this bill, as I understand from some figures that have been used in debate. I say it is not quite the thing to hold out to this country that these people who came forward to aid the Government in a patriotic spirit, and who, in conformity to law, instead of in violation of law, accepted the terms upon which the Government proposed to raise money and accepted the privileges which went with it, shall now be deprived of one of the fruits of their contract. If you point out a bank that was organized after the law was changed, of course that bank took the law as it stood then; but I speak of the banks of which I know in my own State, and which, the moment the act of 1864 was passed, said, by a mutual understanding among them all, with scarcely an exception, "We must come forward to the aid of the Government; we will convert our State circulation; we will take our State capital; we will take the earnings of the farmers, who are nine-tenths of our stockholders; we will lend them to the Government, and take its bonds and bank on them, because that is the proposition of the Government, and patriotism requires it." It was not because they thought they could make more, but it was an act of patriotic self-sacrifice; because, as to the banks of every one of the Eastern States, if they had been suffered to continue on State principles their own affairs in their own way, as they had been accustomed to since the foundation of the Government, they would have made more money, justly and honestly, than they have made under this scheme. But that was not the spirit that animated the people of the Eastern States. It was the spirit of patriotism, that they were ready to sacrifice not only their blood but their money. Those who had not the blood to give in the times of youth and of strength, but who had the accumulated capital of a life-time of labor, they said, "We give you that, and upon the terms you propose."

Now, Mr. President, I do not object to your taking all the capital that you like from the East to the West, because I believe it will turn out in a certain sense to be an advantage to the people, like giving severe medicine that will upset the system for a time; it will open the eyes of some people who do not see, as I think, quite the full bearings of this point. So while I do not object at all, so far as Vermont is concerned, to your taking up every dollar if you like of the bonds that you have of ours and taking up every dollar of our currency, and setting up banks in the West, if you can, I do see that it will have the effect the honorable Senator from Ohio has stated, that it will produce what is sometimes called a stringency, a demand for money; money will be more valuable. There will be less money in the West and less money in the East—if you call this sort of stuff money—than there was before. You will find, therefore, that you have produced a state of things which will bring you nearer to specie payments—if it is not disrespectful to the Senate to allude to specie payments now in the present notions about finance that we have here—it will bring you nearer to specie payments by having a general stir of the pool, if you like; it will break up the eastern banks; let them recall their money, recall their bonds, no matter what the effect is upon the price of bonds in the market; it may put them up, or it may put them down; probably it will put them down a great way, because when these bonds are sent back to the banks, the banks cannot bank upon them, and the banks will then sell their bonds and get for them cash of some kind, and they will set up a State bank or a bank without circulation and attend to their own affairs. But in the mean time, for a year or two, you will find that you have less money capable of being used for the wants of the country in the transfer of commodities and produce from one part of the country to another than you had before; and by and by we shall perhaps get out of this delightful dream that the more money you have that is never payable to anybody or in anything, as it is said this legal-tender of ours was described by an honorable Senator who is not now in his seat, and in which only this national-bank money is redeemable, the better; and the result will be that out of an experiment which will pinch very hard upon the business interests of the country for a year or two while it is going on, we may gain wisdom enough to start again in the right direction.

So then, as I say, Mr. President, in all seriousness, so far as Rhode Island is concerned, though I have no right to speak for her except as a part of our common Union, I believe, so far as the people are concerned in any part of the United States who have earned money, and who are, therefore, entitled to it, instead of promoting the prosperity of the country by this general upturn, you will diminish it, or if you do not, as the Senator from Ohio has very well said, I repeat with him, if it will add anything to the force of his observations, that it would be better that we should destroy every bank in the country than to go into the floating chimera of an irredeemable expansion of what we have.

Mr. CONOVER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to read one law before that motion is made.

Mr. CONOVER. Very well; I give way.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Vermont seems to leave the impression on the Senate that by the act of June 3, 1864, the limitation of law requiring an apportionment of this currency was repealed; but he forgot to read the act of March 3, 1865, which restored it. At the time of the passage of the act of March 3, 1865, the whole amount of national banks organized in the United States was about $100,000,000. From the act of March 3, 1865, I will read the clause providing for apportionment:

> And that $150,000,000 of the entire amount of circulating notes authorized to be issued shall be apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, according to representative population, and the remainder shall be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury among associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of such State, District, and Territory.

Every one of the banks organized in States in excess of their proportion was organized after this act was passed and in defiance of the act.

Mr. CONOVER. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting the question the Chair will lay before the Senate certain House bills for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870;

A bill (H. R. No. 1922) to establish a reservation for certain Indians in the Territory of Montana;

A bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians;

A bill (H. R. No. 1758) authorizing the purchase of six hundred and forty acres of land for a Nez Percé Indian reservation in the Territory of Idaho; and

A bill (H. R. No. 200) for the relief of settlers on the Cherokee strip in Kansas.

Mr. CONOVER. I withdraw my motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, and move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 11, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twelve minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SETTLERS ON CHEROKEE STRIP, KANSAS.

Mr. LOWE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 200) for the relief of settlers on the Cherokee strip, in Kansas, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that all persons who, by the provisions of the second section of the act entitled "An act to carry out certain provisions of the Cherokee treaty of 1866, and for the relief of settlers on the Cherokee lands in the State of Kansas," approved May 11, 1872, who have become entitled at any time to enter and purchase any portion of the lands mentioned in said act, but who have failed to make proof of settlement, entry, and payment within the times provided by said act, shall have and be allowed additional time within which to make such proof of settlement, entry, and payment to the 1st day of January, 1875; and no forfeiture of any rights of such persons shall be had or have effect by reason of failure heretofore to make such proof of settlement, entry, and payment within the time provided by said act, anything in the said act to the contrary notwithstanding; and all persons availing themselves of the provisions of this act shall, at the time of entry and payment, pay interest on the purchase-money of their lands at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the time at which such payments should have been made by the terms of the aforesaid act to the time that payment shall be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ought not this bill to be considered in the Committee of the Whole? It does not actually appropriate property, but does it not amount to the same thing?

Mr. LOWE. This bill makes no appropriation of anything. I think it is not subject to the point of order. It simply extends the time for payment to purchasers of certain lands under the act of 1872. It has been approved unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is recommended by the Commissioner of the General-Land Office. There is nothing, I think, objectionable in any respect in the bill. It makes no appropriation, and requires no expenditure of money.

Mr. HOLMAN. It prevents forfeiture, and in that respect is an appropriation of public property.

Mr. LOWE. It merely extends the time for payment under the act of 1872 for one year.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this apply to actual settlers only?

Mr. LOWE. It does to agricultural settlers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think, except by a strict ruling, this comes within the point of order, and he will not enforce the point of order where it is not clear. The bill will be considered in the House.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand this bill contemplates entry of these lands by parties after the time prescribed in the original act?

Mr. LOWE. Not at all. It simply enables those who have entered upon the lands within the time fixed by the act of 1872 to make payment within the extended time provided in this bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. LOWE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION FROM MEXICAN DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1590) to provide for the better protection of the frontier settlements of Texas against Indian and Mexican depredations, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of War be, and he is thereby, authorized to construct and operate a line of telegraph, beginning at or near the city of Denison, in Grayson County, Texas; thence by the nearest practicable route to Fort Sill, Indian Territory; thence to Fort Richardson, Texas; thence along the northern frontier line of settlements to Forts Griffin and Concho; thence to the Pecos River, at or near the mouth of Toyah Creek; thence to Fort Clark, on Las Moras Creek; thence to Fort Duncan, on the Rio Grande; thence down the Rio Grande, via Fort McIntosh and Ringgold's Barracks. to Brownsville, so as to connect the military posts which are now, or may hereafter be, established on said line with the military headquarters of said district; and that the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that bill must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Let the bill be referred, then, to the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ALABAMA, COOSHATTA, AND MUSCOGEE TRIBES OF INDIANS.

Mr. GIDDINGS also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 175) for the removal of the Alabama, Cooshatta, and Muscogee tribes of Indians from the States of Texas and Louisiana to the Creek Nation, in the Indian Territory, and to supply them one year, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. This makes an appropriation, and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair will consider it a public bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CONTRACTS WITH INDIANS.

Mr. SHANKS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 668) relative to private contracts or agreements made with Indians prior to May 21, 1872, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, in the first section provides that hereafter it shall not be lawful for any United States officer, or other person under its employ or control, to recognize the binding force or legality, or in any manner sustain or enforce or counsel, or give any aid or assistance to sustain or enforce, any contract or agreement made by any person or persons, or corporation, with any band, tribe, or nation of Indians, or individual Indian or Indians, not a citizen of the United States, entered into prior to the date of the act of Congress entitled "An act regulating the mode of making private contracts with Indians," approved May 21, 1872, for the payment or delivery of any money or other thing of value, in present or prospective, or for the granting or procuring any privilege to him or her, or any other person or persons, or corporation, in consideration of services for, or advancements made to, said Indians relative to their lands, or to any claim growing out of or in reference to annuities, installments, or other moneys, claims, demand, or thing, under laws or treaties with the United States, or official acts of any officer thereof, or in any way connected with or due from the United States, unless such contract or agreement was reduced to writing and duly signed by the parties in interest thereto at the time it was entered into, and fully made known to the parties at the time the contract was signed, and then not until such original written contract shall first have been presented to and examined by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and these facts by them severally indorsed thereon, and a copy of said contract and of any assignments that may have been made thereon duly entered of record in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The second section provides that in addition thereto there shall also be filed in said Commissioner's office, and retained therein as official papers, and be examined by said Commissioner and Secretary, and that fact indorsed on them, the following statement of facts touching each and all such contracts and agreements so presented; which statements shall be sworn to specially by all and severally the person or persons claiming interest in and seeking the support and enforcement of such contract or agreement, and not by agent or attorney: first, that the writing presented for examination and record as provided for in the first section of this act, and purporting to be the original contract or agreement, is in fact such, and that it was entered into and reduced to writing at the date and for the purposes it purports to have been made and executed; secondly, such sworn statement shall give particularly the names of the real parties in interest in the original contract or agreement, naming them, if not named in the written contract or agreement, and if either of the contracting parties is a band, tribe, or nation of Indians, or a corporation or firm, the name of the person, officer, or agent contracting in their behalf, together with his authority for so doing, shall be specially stated; thirdly, a particular statement of all and singular the services rendered or the thing or things done under such contract or agreement prior to said filing, with those things to be done or rendered, together with a particular statement of any and all moneys paid or advanced by either party under such contract or agreement, giving in all cases the time, place, and real value of services rendered, or thing or things done, or the kind and manner of payment, whether in money, property, or credits, up to the date of the filing of the said sworn statement; fourthly, state specifically whether the original contract or agreement had been submitted to any Secretary of the Interior, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, superintendent of Indian affairs, Indian agent, commissioner. or other person having official control of or connection with Indian affairs, giving the time when, place where, and person by name to whom such submission was made, and whether by said officer indorsed or not, or whether any such officer was cognizant of such contract or agreement having been made, though not submitted to him for approval.

The third section provides that the Secretary or Commissioner of Indian Affairs is thereby empowered to require, in writing, any additional facts or proofs that may be necessary to aid in determining the true character of the contract or agreement, or assignment thereof.

The fourth section provides that no such contract or agreement shall be recognized by any officer or employé of the United States until the Secretary of the Interior shall, after full consideration of any such contract or agreement, together with the proofs and papers in this act required to be filed and such as the Secretary of the Interior or Commissioner of Indian Affairs may require in addition thereto, the Secretary of the Interior shall consider to be just and reasonable, and not tainted with fraud, and not exorbitant in its demands; provided, that the Secretary of the Interior shall in all cases enter, in writing, on such original contract, on the record in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, wherein such original contract is recorded, an official statement, showing that the contract or agreement and proofs have been filed in accordance with the provisions of this act and considered by him, and in his opinion said contract or agreement, or assignments thereof, are not exorbitant and not fraudulent, and that they are just, the same shall be valid. But if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior such contract or agreement, or the assignment thereof, is fraudulent or exorbitant, he shall officially enter his rejection, in writing, upon the record of such contract or agreement, and they shall not be considered of binding force by any officer or employé of the United States.

The fifth section provides that it is thereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause an investigation to be made of all existing contracts or agreements, within the purview of this act, now on file in his office, or of the Office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or any other Office or Bureau under his control, and by special notice to the party or parties in interest compel, in the case of each such contract or agreement so found on file, the same strictness of official examination and indorsement, record and sworn statement of fact, as is required by the several provisions of this act; provided, that the investigation of facts touching the character of any contract or agreement contemplated by this act may be made by a commissioner appointed by the President for that purpose, who shall report all such facts to the Secretary of the Interior in writing.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my colleague from Indiana, who is familiar with this whole subject, will give the House a statement of the general scope and purpose of the bill. It is a long and complicated measure, and cannot well be understood on a single reading.

Mr. SHANKS. By a provision of the statute of 1847 all executory contracts made with Indians are declared to be null and void. However, in introducing this bill I did not deem it to be necessary to deal with that subject. The committee, in passing upon it, did not see fit to ask the House to legislate upon the validity of contracts. But on the 21st of May, 1872, Congress passed a law providing for the mode and manner of making contracts with Indians from that time forward. This leaves on file in the Departments a large numberof contracts, whether valid or not I do not now state; but that many of them are enormous in their proportions can be ascertained by looking at them. Very large amounts of money have been collected from Indians on these contracts since that time; and since 1847, since the passage of the act for making contracts with the Indians, there has been a large amount of money collected. It is proposed by this bill to subject all that class of contracts to the scrutiny of the official examination of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and it requires that they shall put an official indorsement on the paper, saying that the contract is not exorbitant and not fraudulent, or that it is exorbitant and is fraudulent. Until that official indorsement is put upon the contract every officer and employé of the Government is forbidden to recognize the legality of those contracts or to make any payment upon them in any way whatever.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I understand the gentleman correctly these provisions apply entirely to the claims against the Indians now on file in the Department.

Mr. SHANKS. Yes, sir; to those entered into prior to the 21st of May, 1872.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana one question. Is the law of 1872 interfered with at all by this bill?

Mr. SHANKS. Not at all. Even the title of the bill says that it has to do with contracts or agreements made with Indians prior to May 21, 1872.

I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I observe that the first section of the bill, in the ninth and tenth lines, speaks of Indians "not citizens of the United States." I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana, who is probably more familiar with the rights of this class of persons than any other gentleman in the House with reference to this bill and all similar legislation, what in his judgment is the condition of the Indians under the fourteenth and fifteenth articles of amendment to the Constitution—what Indians are citizens and what Indians are not?

Mr. SHANKS. I hardly think that that question arises in connection with this bill. But I will state to the gentleman what my opinion in regard to it is.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Before the gentleman proceeds to answer me he will allow me to add one sentence to my question. The fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution provides that—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States.

And then the fifteenth article provides that—

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race.

Now, I desire to know, with reference to the whole policy of the Committee on Indian Affairs in future, what solution they have given to one of the questions raised by these two amendments. Is an Indian, born in a Territory under the jurisdiction of the United States, a citizen? And if he is, can we, or can anybody, deprive him of the right to vote by reason of race? Certainly the right to make a contract is an important right of citizenship. I am aware that this bill does not distinctly raise the question I have suggested, but I should like to have the gentleman's opinion upon it.

Mr. SHANKS. The question of the gentleman from Massachusetts covers considerable ground, and I will have to take it by items. In the first place, the bill does not interfere with the mode of making contracts at all. So much for that. If the parties concerned were white persons, it would not be detrimental to their rights, even if they were citizens. Now, as to the question of the effect of the amendments to the Constitution on the Indians of this country, the Committee on Indian Affairs has not given its opinion, and I could not speak for any member of that committee except myself. I can speak, however, for myself. In drawing this bill I drew it in such a way as distinctly to avoid the question of the validity of contracts. I drew it only in reference to the character of those contracts, as to their being exorbitant or fraudulent; and I did so because I believed that the Indians of this country, under the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution, are citizens of the United States. That is my own opinion; but I drew this bill specially to avoid any conflict with that question. In drawing the bill I desired to deal with the question only of the character of the contracts themselves. Inasmuch as the Government itself now exercises, and has in all time past exercised, that control over the Indians which leaves them in the condition of wards, I drew the bill in the same way as I would have done if it had been a bill for taking care of a ward's estate. I avoided the question suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but personally I believe that they are citizens of the United States. The Committee on Indian Affairs, however, have not acted upon that question, and I cannot speak for them. I ask the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. COMINGO, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 669) to secure a more efficient administration of Indian affairs, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute (H. R. No. 1929) was received, and read a first and second time.

The bill was read.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. This is a very important bill. I have not attended closely to the reading of the whole bill, but it seems to me that it ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Does the bill contain an appropriation in any form whatever?

Mr. COMINGO. None whatever.

Mr. SHANKS. There is no appropriation in the bill, and no new office is created by it.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. COMINGO. Mr. Speaker, I will state that this bill is in substance the same as the bill passed at the last session of Congress by this House, and which failed in the Senate for want of time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. What alterations have been made in the bill?

Mr. COMINGO. No material alterations have been made. There has been some little change in the phraseology, but none in effect. As I have already said, this bill is in substance the same which passed the House during the last Congress but failed in the Senate for want of time. The title of the bill, as read at the Clerk's desk, plainly indicates its purpose. It is to secure a more efficient administration of Indian affairs. I could go on to explain each section of the bill if it were necessary, and will do so if it shall become necessary. It simply, however, provides that books, and vouchers, and papers, &c., which have not been regarded as records, shall be so regarded hereafter. It further provides against the signing or delivering of vouchers or other papers in blank. It is punitive in its character, furthermore, and any violation of its provisions may be punished by fine or imprisonment or both—imprisonment of not less than six months nor more than five years, and a fine not exceeding the sum of $1,000. It also extends the time within which prosecution may be had. Under the law as it now stands, I believe, a crime or offense of the character provided against in this bill can only be punished when an indictment is found within two years after the commission of the offense. This bill extends the time within which indictments may be found for such offenses to five years after the offenses were committed. The reason for that is the difficulty that exists in collecting the testimony necessary to determine whether an indictment can or cannot be sustained.

Without going further into the provisions of the bill, I will state that the committee were unanimous in their report; there was not a dissenting voice, so far as I remember, when the committee were called to pass upon it. Its effect will be salutary, and I know of no interest that needs protection more than that which we are endeavoring to protect by the proposed legislation. Unless, therefore, some gentlemen wish to engage in the discussion of the bill, and to examine its provisions more at length, I think a vote should be taken upon it; but before calling the previous question I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHANKS] particularly to one item in this bill. I believe the bill is a very good one, as I said last spring, one of the very best that I remember to have seen brought before the House; but in May, 1872, in the Indian appropriation bill, the act of March, 1871, which provided that the board of Indian commissioners should have a right to examine all vouchers before they were paid, was repealed by this proviso:

That the examination of vouchers and accounts by the executive committee of the board of Indian commissioners shall not be a prerequisite of payment.

I am advised, not only by gentlemen connected with the board of Indian commissioners, but I have seen a publication in the press addressed to the President by William Welsh, of Philadelphia, making the charge that since July, 1873, over half a million dollars have been wrongfully paid against the protest of the commissioners; and what I desire to know is whether the gentleman has considered this matter, and whether an amendment ought not to be made to this bill repealing that proviso which prevented these gentlemen from examining vouchers before they were paid, and restoring the provisions of the act of March 3, 1871, which required the board of commissioners to examine the vouchers and see that the claims were just before they were paid. If such an amendment would be proper in this bill, I think, in view of what has occurred, the House ought to insert it.

Mr. SHANKS. I have not charge of the bill before the House now, although I introduced it. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COMINGO] has charge of it. The bill now reported is the one agreed to by the committee.

As to the point made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] there is not only no objection on the part of the committee to consider it, but the committee have decided to consider that very question. The question was raised, however, in the committee after this bill had been drawn.

Mr. BECK. Do the committee propose to consider the subject to which I have alluded and again report?

Mr. SHANKS. They do.

Mr. BECK. Then I have no amendment to offer.

Mr. COMINGO. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COMINGO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EPISCOPAL BOARD OF MISSIONS.

Mr. AVERILL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1930) to secure to the Episcopal Board of Missions the land in the White Earth Indian reservation, in Minnesota, on which are situated their church and other buildings; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the Mississippi band of Chippewa Indians, to issue to the Episcopal Board of Missions a patent for eighty acres of land, embracing the church, parsonage, hospital, and such other buildings as may have been, or may prior to the issue of such patent be erected, under direction of said board, on the White Earth Indian reservation, in Minnesota, such land to be selected by the person acting under the authority of said board, and reported by the United States agent for the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota to the Office of Indian Affairs; provided that the estate to be conveyed to said board shall cease and be determined when the land and erections thereon shall no longer be occupied or used by said board for missionary and school purposes.

Mr. AVERILL. In explanation of this bill I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked in a communication sent to this House by the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to be in receipt, by Department reference, of the letter of Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, of 17th instant, relative to the question whether the Department is authorized by law to convey the lands on the White Earth reservation to the Episcopal Board of Missions, that board having erected, at their own expense, a hospital, church, and parsonage, and still proposing to erect other buildings, as they may be needed, for mission purposes.

In reply I have to state that this transfer cannot be made without special legislation in the case; and I respectfully suggest that, as the consent of the Indians can, without doubt, be readily obtained, Congress be requested to authorize the Department to convey eighty acres of land for this purpose.

A draught of a bill for this purpose is inclosed herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

ON CAR, P. O., FARIBAULT, January 17, 1874.

HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR: You are aware that I have, at very great expense, built a hospital at White Earth reservation for the Indians. A friend has offered to endow the hospital, if the title to it can be made secure in our Board of Missions.

Is there not a law by which you can convey to us the property where our mission buildings stand, say forty or eighty acres, for church, parsonage, hospital, &c., all of which I have built? We propose to add to these buildings as time goes on. Pardon my writing with a pencil. It is very important that I get an answer early, and I shall not be where I can get pen and ink for a day.

With kind regards, yours, respectfully,

H. B. WHIPPLE.

Hon. C. DELANO, Washington.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. AVERILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALOME DECK.

Mr. AVERILL also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 980) for the relief of Salome Deck; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF DISTRICT AFFAIRS.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the concurrent resolution of the House providing for an investigation into the affairs of the District of Columbia, which resolution has come back from the Senate with a single amendment, filling the blank in the resolution with the word "three," as the number of said committee on the part of the Senate.

No objection was made; and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received a communication from Hon. E. H. ROBERTS, stating that his time is now entirely engrossed on the Committee on Ways and Means, and asking to be excused from service upon the District investigating committee. The Chair hears no objection, and will name in his stead the Representative from the Buffalo district, Hon. LYMAN K. BASS.

GENERAL O. O. HOWARD.

Mr. COBURN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution in relation to the court of inquiry upon General O. O. Howard, which has come back from the Senate with some verbal amendments in relation to dates. It is to amend the resolution so that it will read, "communications of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of date December 4, 1873, and the 5th day of January, 1874."

No objection was made; and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TREASURY CONTRACTS FOR RECOVERY OF TAXES.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Ways and Means a resolution offered on yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] with the following substitute therefor:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House with full copies of all contracts made under the authority of the Treasury Department, in pursuance of one of the provisions of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, approved May 8, 1872; and also copies of all schedules and correspondence and orders of the Department relating to said contracts, and also the amount of money paid under said contracts, and by whom and under what contract paid.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill. And, pending that motion, I move that all debate upon the bill and amendment pending thereto be limited to five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that at least ten minutes will be allowed on the pending amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well; I will say ten minutes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on this bill and the pending amendment is limited to ten minutes. The Clerk will report the pending amendment, being an additional section moved by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. COBB.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of War, in the expenditure of any money appropriated by this bill where the Pacific Railroads, or any of their branches, in any case where the Government retains the amount charged for its business on account of advances made to such railroads or either of them, come into competition with any other line of transportation, in deciding which line of transportation is the lowest bidder, shall consider all the money to be paid to the said Pacific Railroads or their branches as so much saved to the Treasury and govern the transportation of men and supplies accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say a word in regard to the pending proposition. Before doing so I ask the Clerk to read the third section of the act making a grant of land to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the said lands hereby granted to said State shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof for the purpose aforesaid, and no other; and the said railways and branches shall be and remain public highways, for the use of the Government of the United States, free from all toll or other charges upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House will notice that this section in relation to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road provides that they shall receive no compensation upon the transportation of property and troops of the United States. I desire to have again read a portion of a communication from the Quartermaster-General, which was read to the House on yesterday. The statement of the Quartermaster-General shows that, in defiance of this law, his department is paying to this road two-thirds of the ordinary rates for transportation. And I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. COBB,] who offers the proposition, to the single fact that Congress has retained the absolute right to have the property and troops of the Government transported free of charge on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad. The right is not conditional, but absolute. Yet the fact appears, in the communication read to the House yesterday, that the War Department is paying this road two-thirds of the usual cost of transportation. I ask that the language of the Quartermaster-General be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Kansas Pacific and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroads are competing routes to New Mexico and Colorado.

The former is a road to aid in the construction of which the United States issued its bonds, and the charter of the road authorizes it to charge the United States the public tariff rates. The latter is what is known as a "land-grant" road, and for transportation over it this department pays—as in the cases of all other roads similarly chartered—but 66⅔ per cent. of its public tariff rates.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Kansas will see that the grant to this road contains an unconditional reservation of the right of the Government to have troops and property transported upon the road free of charge. Hence the effect of the gentleman's proposition will be to give pay for transportation to a road which is absolutely prohibited by the terms of its grant from receiving from the Government one cent for transportation. Some action on this subject is imperatively demanded; for, in direct violation of law, the War Department is paying for this transportation. I trust the point is now very clearly before the House and the country. The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road is certainly not entitled to any payment for transportation for the Government, and any money that may have been paid to it on that account should be refunded to the Treasury.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I wish to say that I have no other interest in this matter than a desire to save to the Government about a quarter of a million of dollars upon the transportation over roads with which I am acquainted. The committee can either vote the proposition up or vote it down. I merely deemed it my duty, as a member having acquaintance with the facts, to bring this matter before the committee for its action. Having done this, I feel that I have discharged my duty to the Government and my duty to my State; and I have nothing more to say upon the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] has simply discharged his duty to his State and his constituency in offering this amendment. But I desire that the committee shall not be misled by the proposition. I do not care to discuss the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] who has just spoken, which I think is not precisely relevant to the present question. But I want the committee to bear in mind that if the amendment be adopted we thereby tie the Quartermaster's Department down to one line of transportation. We impose an iron rule. I say, upon the authority of the Quartermaster-General, as appears by his letter read yesterday—the latest letter he has written on this subject—that the adoption of the amendment would compel him to pay additional wagon transportation, the most expensive item in Army transportation. If the amendment be adopted, then, under all circumstances, no matter what the emergency, everything in the form of Army transportation and supplies must go over this one railroad. It is a fixed, unbending rule. And from the end of this road supplies must be transported in wagons, no matter though the distance be hundreds of miles. I think the Quartermaster-General is entirely right in this matter, and that if we adopt this amendment we must make a very much larger appropriation for transportation than would otherwise be necessary.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas should be amended by striking out the last clause, and making the proposition in this form:

That the Secretary of War, in the expenditure of any money appropriated by this bill, where the Pacific Railroads or any of their branches, in any case where the Government retains the amount charged for its business on account of advances made to such railroads, or either of them, come into competition with any other line of transportation, in deciding which line of transportation is the lowest bidder, shall, when equally favorable terms can be secured, give such transportation to such road.

Mr. WHEELER. The Quartermaster-General says he is doing that now.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Vermont will observe that one of the roads is bound to furnish transportation to the Government for nothing according to the very terms of the law.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. And the other company is bound to furnish transportation for two-thirds of its ordinary rates.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. COBB, of Kansas, there were—ayes 27, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to amend by adding, as a new section, the following:

That the two additional commissioners to be appointed under the provisions of this act shall be selected from among the citizens of the States lately in rebellion.

Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WHEELER. Debate is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed by the House for debate has expired.

Mr. BROMBERG. I thought the debate was only closed on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed on the bill by order of the House.

Mr. BROMBERG. I wish to state, in a few words, the reason why the amendment is offered and why it should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed by order of the House.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask for the execution of the order of the House.

Mr. BROMBERG. I hope the House will allow me to state why I offered the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is entirely out of order.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes not counted.

The Chair ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. BROMBERG and Mr. WHEELER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 84.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BROMBERG. I offer the following amendment, to come in as an additional section:

That no money shall hereafter be paid out of any funds belonging to any department of the Government to secret agents or informers in the service of the southern claims commission while executing the provisions of this act.

Mr. WHEELER. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is new legislation, and not in order to this general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the amendment cannot be received.

Mr. COX. I move the following amendment, to come in as an additional section:

SEC. 5. No money shall be paid for any purpose by any officer of the Government, except for the purpose for which it is specifically appropriated, and no money shall be paid without appropriation by Congress; and on conviction for the violation of this law, the officer so convicted shall be thereafter forever ineligible to hold any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. COX. I will strike off the last clause of that amendment, and offer it then as a new amendment. I strike off the penalty, and that will leave the amendment as it was accepted the other day by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WHEELER. The latter clause was not in it then.

Mr. COX. I strike off the latter clause.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to say to my friend from New York that the act of 1870 is almost literally what is proposed in his amendment.

Mr. COX. It is never executed, and it can do no harm to repeat it.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with my friend, and I do not make the point of order except on the latter clause.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 40; no quorum voting.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WHEELER and Mr. COX.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 102.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TODD. I move to add to line 123, on page 6 of the bill——

Mr. WHEELER. I make the point of order we cannot go back to that page.

The CHAIRMAN. That section of the bill has been passed, and further amendment to it is not in order.

Mr. WHEELER. If there be no more amendments to be offered I move the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

Mr. TODD. I will now move the amendment to come in as an additional section, and would like to state the reason for it.

Mr. WHEELER. I object to debate.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. No part of the moneys hereby appropriated shall be applied to the payment of the services of persons in civil life for examining and inspecting work done in and about national cemeteries; but the said services shall be performed by quartermasters of the regular Army, to be detailed for that purpose.

Mr. WHEELER. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. TODD. It is merely limiting the appropriations already made, and is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TODD. I rise to a privileged question. I had not yielded the floor when the Chair decided that the amendment submitted by me was not in order. I take an appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am willing to withhold my amendment until the gentleman from Pennsylvania can be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania lost the floor when he offered an amendment not in order. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Maryland, and when he is through, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TODD. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, ruling my amendment out of order. I take the ground that my amendment does not propose new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

Mr. TODD. Let the amendment be reported. I offer it as a distinct section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland, and as soon as the gentleman from Maryland is through, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I offer the following as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That no portion of the Army of the United States shall be hereafter employed in the enforcement of any act of Congress or proclamation of the President which has any tendency or effect to interfere with the rights of the States of the Union to regulate and control elections of State officers.

Mr. WHEELER. I make the point of order that that is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken, and the amendment is not before the committee. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TODD.]

Mr. TODD. I have modified my amendment by striking out the latter portion of it. I offer this to come in as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That no part of the moneys hereby appropriated shall be applied to the payment of the services of persons in civil life for examining and inspecting work done in and about national cemeteries.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me make my point of order distinctly on that amendment, that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. TODD] may understand it. I say that the section before the committee now is the fourth section of this bill. We have passed over all the other sections. This relates to an appropriation in the former part of the bill and is not germane to the pending section. I put the point of order upon that ground; and also upon the additional ground that the amendment involves new legislation. We can never finish the bill if we go back to paragraphs we have already considered and disposed of.

Mr. SPEER. My colleague does not offer this as an amendment to anything already passed, but as a new section.

Mr. WHEELER. It must be germane to the section under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that the amendment as now modified is but a limitation on the expenditure of the money appropriated in the bill, and is therefore in order as an independent section.

The question being put on Mr. TODD'S amendment, there were—ayes 55, noes 66; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. TODD and Mr. WHEELER were appointed.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is now dividing, and an amendment to an amendment is not now in order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I addressed the Chair before the count began.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 78.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TODD. I give notice that I will offer this in the House and call the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. GARFIELD. You cannot do that.

Mr. COX. I offer the following amendment as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Army of the United States shall not be used in aid of the pretended State government known as the Kellogg government in Louisiana, or so as to interfere in the elections of that or any other State.

Mr. WHEELER. I think that is obnoxious to the point of order, and I make it.

Mr. COX. I think it will be in order to state precedents.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order. The point of order is made that this is new legislation. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. COX. Will the Chair allow me to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SYPHER. I hope the Chair will admit that amendment. The Kellogg government have troops enough to thrash out the rebel democracy without the aid of the United States.

Mr. COX. Get thee from behind me, Satan. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; and they have rascals enough, too.

Mr. COX. I would like to give two reasons, just to show that my amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The Clerk will again report the gentleman's amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. To this amendment the point of order was made that it contains new legislation, and the Chair has sustained that point of order. From this decision the gentleman from New York takes an appeal, and the Chair will now submit the question, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Do not the rules provide that the rules of the House shall be applicable in committee?

The CHAIRMAN. So far as they are applicable, the rules of the House are applicable in committee.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is there any rule which prohibits debate on a bill on a question of order of this kind?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by order of the House on this bill and all amendments thereto, and the Chair decides that when that is done, it closes debate on all matters incidental to the bill.

Mr. COX. I appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. One appeal is already pending and must first be decided.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I call for the reporting of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The amendment was again read.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order, without debating them, to state two precedents for an amendment of this kind to the Army appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The Chair was about to submit the appeal to the committee.

Mr. KILLINGER. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion cannot be entertained in the committee. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being put, it was decided in the affirmative. So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer the following proviso to the fourth section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That none of the claims already reported by said Quartermaster and Commissary General's Departments to the Treasury Department for payment shall be affected by the provisions of this act.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to say to my friend from Tennessee that that is exactly what is provided in the second and third sections of this bill. The gentleman's proviso would be merely tautological. That class of cases is provided for in the second and third sections, which require that every claim which shall be in the Auditor's Office at the passage of this bill shall be settled under the act of 1864.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COX. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question being put on Mr. HARRISON's amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KELLOGG reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments.

Mr. WHEELER. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. WHEELER. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. YOUNG,] extending the time for the presentation of claims, and on that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rose for the purpose of asking a separate vote on that amendment.

The Clerk read Mr. YOUNG's amendment, as follows:

On page 10, line 9, strike out "four" and insert "five," so that the section will read:

SEC. 4. That all claims of citizens who remained loyal adherents to the cause and Government of the United States during the war, for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States, and for the use or loss of vessels or boats while employed in the military service of the United States, including any such claims now pending and undetermined in any department of the Government, shall be presented before the 1st day of November, 1875, to the commissioners of claims created by act of March 3, 1871, who shall have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine the same, &c.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 131, nays 104, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Atkins, Barnum, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cessna, John B. During the roll-call,

Mr. DONNAN said: My colleague, Mr. MCDILL, is confined to his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If no separate vote be demanded the remaining amendments will be considered as concurred in.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the provision in regard to payments for transportation be changed so as to come in immediately after the one hundred and fourth line of the bill where it properly belongs.

Mr. WHEELER. That is its proper place, and that change ought to be made.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House proceed to business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of referring the bills thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

CHILDREN OF GENERAL JAMES H. CARLETON.

The first bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 59) granting relief to Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, children of General James H. Carleton, deceased; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ROBERT BENT AND JACK SMITH.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 204) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. LOWE. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPOSITS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SYPHER. That bill is being informally considered by the Committee on Commerce, and I ask that it remain on the table.

Mr. NEGLEY. O, no; I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SYPHER. I object to the reference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot object, unless a majority of the House object with him.

The question was put on Mr. NEGLEY's motion; and it was agreed to.

CEMETERY AT SALT LAKE CITY.

The next bill upon the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the various votes by which these bills have just been referred; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PLACER-MINING LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LOWE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1717) relating to placer-mining lands in the State of California, with a substitute therefor; which was ordered to be recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider, and ordered to be printed.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the fortification appropriation bill; and, pending that motion, I move that all general debate on the bill be limited to fifteen minutes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to; and the motion to go into Committee of the Whole was also agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole (Mr. COX in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 1037, making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications, and other works of defense.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate upon this bill is limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I suppose there will not be a disposition to discuss this bill much. I would like to have the members of this committee direct their attention to the items of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bill had better be read for the information of the committee.

The Clerk then read the bill at length.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Chairman, the policy of fortifying the most important harbors of our sea-coast has often been discussed by our most eminent statesmen and scientific men. This discussion has been thorough and exhaustive, and the result, as shown in the reports of committees and boards of engineers, has established the wisdom of this policy. I do not feel that I should be justified in occupying much time in the general discussion. It may, however, be expected, as the duty has been assigned me by the Committee on Appropriations of reporting this bill, that a few general considerations should be submitted. With the permission of the committee, then, I will make a brief statement in regard to the bill under consideration.

The estimates at first submitted by the proper Department for continuing the work on our fortifications and sea-coast defenses for the next fiscal year were $3,601,000. These estimates were made with a view to placing our fortifications in a more complete condition of efficiency, in contemplation of the emergency that was impending a few months since. But when it was suggested by Congress on assembling that the depression in the finances of the country called for a revision of estimates, the War Department and the Chief of Engineers, General Humphreys, with a most commendable spirit seconded the wishes of Congress in the line of economy, and by a thorough revision reduced the estimates to $1,407,500. Since then the Committee on Appropriations, after repeated conferences with General Humphreys, and on a careful examination of every item in the estimates, and with his hearty co-operation, have reduced them to $994,000, the amount proposed to be appropriated in this bill.

The amount heretofore appropriated has often been much larger, and it has been generally most wisely expended. Compared with any year before the war even, when labor was cheap, the appropriation this year is a successful effort in the line of economy. Take a few years by way of comparison.

There was appropriated for fortifications, in—

1836	$1,710,000
1847	1,570,000
1854	1,134,573
1855	1,010,500
1856	1,842,600
1857	1,818,300

During the war large sums were appropriated, some years amounting to several millions.

For the last three years the amount appropriated is as follows:

1871	$1,211,500

This reduction, as the committee will see, is most marked, the sum reported being little more than one-quarter of the original estimates, and still the work contemplated by those first estimates was demanded by the changes that have recently been made in the size and the armor of vessels, and the greatly increased power of cannon that have come in use. But for the present appropriations are made only for a few points where the work is in such a condition as to require immediate attention.

We have an immense line of sea-coast on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, with six States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, any one of which is larger than some of the empires of Europe, with scores of cities and sea-ports that require defense; and looking to what has been done and the present demands, the sum appropriated in this bill would seem to be as limited as the nature of the case admits. It may be suggested, that after such expenditures for so many years, our sea-coast defenses should be in a state of efficiency without further outlay. It is true the sum in the aggregate is large, but it must be considered that this extends over many years, and protects a line of sea-coast of ten thousand miles and harbors of twice as many States as composed the original States of the Union. And then within a few years radical and extraordinary changes have taken place in the navies of the world and in their armament.

Look at England, with the most magnificent navy on the globe. The last year, and for several years, with less than one-tenth of our sea-coast to protect, with few sea-board cities and few harbors, she appropriated $5,000,000 for ten fortifications alone. And this has been her policy for many years, and it is the policy of every enlightened commercial nation in Europe that has a sea-coast to protect.

The existing fortifications of the country, including a few useless remains of the revolutionary works, are due to three distinct periods, namely:

First. Those that grew out of the threatened difficulties with France, nearly a century ago. They were of a temporary character generally.

Secondly. On the approach of the war of 1812 another class of works was erected at many of our principal ports. They were small and weak, and built, for the sake of economy, of cheap materials and workmanship.

Thirdly. The present permanent system of works was entered upon by the Government soon after the war of 1812. The works erected are now projected and planned by a board of engineers, subject to revision by the Chief of Engineers, and finally sanctioned by the Secretary of War. Owing to the changes in the character of the means and power of attack which at several periods have been developed, the character of the permanent works have also been changed or modified.

From the commencement of the permanent system to about 1830 the works erected were such as were called upon to resist 18 and 24 pounders, the ordnance of that day, and consisted mainly of earthen batteries. From 1830 to about 1864 there was great improvement in the character of our sea-coast batteries. The works of this later period were of a strength to resist the heavy 10-inch smooth-bore and shell guns, and the dimensions of the parts were arranged for armaments of that description.

The introduction of steam, of iron-plating, and rifled guns of large caliber upon armed sea-going vessels, has necessitated a change in the details of construction of our works, and the size and caliber of the armaments to be used. A full study of the problem proposed, with a discussion of experiments made, has led to the adoption of certain principles that now govern in the construction of our works of sea-coast defense, and they are fully embodied in a communication from the Secretary of War, contained in Executive Document No. 271, House of Representatives, Forty-first Congress, second session.

In that communication the general conclusions arrived at were as follows:

The results exhibited by these experiments do not enable the board to recommend any plan of construction for casemates or shields for sea-coast or harbor-defense batteries. The inadequacy of the methods of construction hitherto used is fully proved, but the proper or best substitute for them is not clearly indicated. It has been hitherto assumed, rather than demonstrated, that iron is the true substitute for masonry. A resort to it may be compulsory in some cases, but it will not do to embark upon extensive construction in that material upon assumption, nor to ignore the probability, in this era of change in the instruments of warfare, of wasting the treasures of the nation upon structures which may be as unfit to resist the means of attack of a future year as those works, completed on the highest principles of art then known in 1859, are of resisting the artillery of the present day. One of the very highest authorities—the veteran field-marshal, Sir John Burgoyne, until quite recently at the head of the English royal engineers—remarks, in commenting upon the Gibraltar shields, "how rapidly the increasing power of the new artillery creates the necessity for additional resisting power both on shore and afloat. That which may afford adequate protection one day may be insufficient to resist the powers of the artillery that may be in existence when the shield is produced on completion of the contract." Still more recent experiments in England upon the "Plymouth" shield, upon the "Millwall," the "Chalmers," and other experimental constructions, only add to the force of these words, and show that thus far the destructive power of guns, both by increase of caliber and improvement in projectiles, more than keeps pace with protective invention.

Nor, if we look to the experience of yet other nations, do we find anything more satisfactory. The Russians appear to have gone practically into iron construction more extensively than any other nation, but this board has no ground to believe that the constructions employed are superior to the English designs just alluded to.

Of what has been done or is being done in other European nations we have but meager information. When it is borne in mind that a European war has been a probable contingency at any moment in the last two or three years; that equally with Russia and England, France, Austria, and Italy have, in the shape of great commercial ports and naval depots, objects of vital interest to hold against naval attack, we cannot infer, because we find no published facts to the contrary, that these nations have been inert or have neglected any practicable and well-founded measure of precaution and safety. If, therefore, it shall appear that little has been done or established with them concerning iron construction, it will be a confirmation of the opinion advanced by the board that no satisfactory results have been arrived at upon which it could be based.

We have stated that the results thus far attained "do not enable the board to recommend any plan of construction for casemates or shields for sea-coast or harbor-defense batteries;" yet if the problem is limited to resist such guns as were used in the experiments, or such as were used by the English against the Plymouth and Millwall shields, it is not to be inferred that such a construction, though necessarily costly, is considered unattainable. It is almost beyond the range of possibility that, in a real engagement with a fleet, the shields or casemates of the fort should be so severely tested as were the casemate shield at Fort Monroe and the casemate at Fort Delaware, or the English "Plymouth" and "Millwall" shields; and, indeed it is quite probable that guns protected by those constructions might have done good service. However that may be, none of them can be considered as fulfilling all conditions, or as being the best forms for such structures, to arrive at which we need further experiments and investigation on many points:

1. Improvement in the quality and manufacture of iron plates, and determining what qualities and combinations of metal are best adapted to the purpose. Some foreign plates should be procured for comparison, and test plates from American manufacturers be called for. Incidental to this is the analysis of the irons used in the shields just tried, and perhaps other irons.

2. Experiments upon cast-iron or east-iron concrete, or both, as a material for piers or parts of fronts remote from the embrasures. It is understood that the latter material is being manufactured by Krupp for Prussian fortifications.

3. It is desirable to ascertain by experiment whether a concrete of lead may not be applied to the face of a shield in order to take up the greater part of the living force of the projectile; whether the same material or simple bars of lead may not advantageously be inserted between front plates to the same end.

4. It is important to know the exact state of iron construction in Europe at the present date, not only with regard to experimental results, (of which we are pretty well informed,) but as to its actual application to sea-coast batteries. This kind of information can hardly be obtained without personal investigation by one or more engineer officers.

In the foregoing no reference has been made to the possibility or probability that a much more powerful ordnance than any yet used may be arrayed against shore batteries. We know that some of our own turreted iron-clads—the Kalamazoo, for instance—are designed to carry 20-inch guns. The 50-ton steel rifled gun of Krupp is rated as yet more powerful, its powder charge being, as stated, from 110 to 130 pounds, and its solid steel shot weighing 1,212 pounds. In the experiments and investigations suggested, the problem to make constructions capable of facing such ordnance must be kept in view.

In thus postponing the application of iron construction upon our works of harbor defense, the board feels called upon to point out in what direction progress should be made in providing for the defense of our harbors:

First. By the arranging, whenever the site will permit, of cheaply constructed barbette batteries, without breast-height walls and with wooden platforms for the guns. Such a battery may readily be modified hereafter so as to adapt it to the use of a depressing (or counterpoise) carriage, and should, unless on a very elevated site, be planned with this view.

Secondly. The substitution for the barbette carriage of one which will admit of the depression of the gun below the crest of the parapet for loading. Earth is the cheapest and best of all materials to stop shot. But the common system of barbette mounting, that is, so as to fire over an earthen parapet, which was pretty sure to fail under the old system of things whenever the batteries were low and could be closely approached, is, under the same or even much more favorable circumstances, almost inadmissible for the enormous guns of the present day, in consequence of the unavoidable exposure of the cannonier during the laborious process of loading. The English are understood to have adopted the Moncrieff carriage, a device of great merit. A working model of a carriage on identically the same principles, invented by the late Brevet Brigadier-General De Russy many years ago, is now in possession of the Engineer Bureau. Under this and other forms this subject is being now studied, and in the achieving of a practicable result we see a way opened most clearly to attaining an efficient service of modern sea-coast artillery where the proper sites present themselves.

Thirdly. The development of a system of defense by mortars of large caliber. To prevent the occupation as an anchorage of a roadstead, there is nothing more effectual than the mortar. It is believed, though never yet extensively introduced for that purpose, that it may be made an efficient agent of defense, against iron-clads, of the channels of approach to our cities and ports, and, if so, its emplacement involves none of the embarrassing questions of iron construction. It is well known that there are no projectiles of which sailors have greater dread than those from mortars, and that the invulnerability of side of an armored vessel can be but very imperfectly extended to her deck. On the other hand, the difficulty of hitting by vertical fire an object of as small an area as the deck of a vessel is conceded. But when it is understood that considerable accuracy of mortar fire can be attained against stationary objects, such as vessels in position or arrested temporarily by obstructions, at distances not exceeding the width of most ship-channels, and that the increased effect of successful shot will in some degree compensate for inferior accuracy, as compared with the gun, the mortar will readily be accepted as one of the most efficient means of defense against the modern means of attack.

Fourthly. Defense by torpedoes. Although devices to be classified with what are now called, generically, "torpedoes," have been long known, it cannot be said that their use took any practical shape until the Crimean war, when the Russians, with no very noticeable results, introduced them into the defense of several of their ports on the Baltic. It was a sharp spur of necessity which drove the South, in our civil war, to every imaginable expedient to neutralize the maritime superiority of the United States which so greatly developed their use and showed the importance of the new defensive agent.

The Secretary of the Navy uses in regard to them the following significant language:

"The only vessels lost by the United States Government in both these attacks," (i. e., in the defenses of Mobile Bay, Alabama, and at Fort Fisher, North Carolina,) "and the shore batteries of the confederates were splendily served, were destroyed by electric torpedoes, which, always formidable in harbors and internal waters, have proved more destructive to our naval vessels than all other means combined."

The destruction of two ocean and two river monitors, (the Tecumseh, the Patapsco, the Milwaukee, the Osage,) the iron-clads Cairo and Cincinnati, the tin-clad Rodolph, the sloop of war Housatonic, besides several gun-boats and transports,* are the striking facts which authorize the Secretary's strong expressions, as also the moral effect which their real or supposed existence uniformly had upon our attacking squadrons. We are now thoroughly acquainted with the confederate inventions; but European nations have taken up the matter where they left off. Colonel Jervais (royal engineers) says in a lecture on "coast defense," before the Royal United Service Institution:

"The labors of a committee lately appointed have been crowned with perfect success, and both naval officers and engineers are passing through courses of torpedo instruction." * * * * * * *

And, again:

"We are now in a position to apply this system of defense to any extent that may be required for the protection of our harbors and other points upon our coasts."

We find it stated also in the Army and Navy Gazette:

"Further experiments have been made at Toulon with torpedoes, and it has been decided, in case of war, that that port shall be strongly defended with these submarine monsters. The government, however, thinks that the torpedo subject is one which should be confided to a special corps, and hence a school is to be established at the isle of Aix, where the mysteries of these engines of destruction will be taught."

The Austrian government we know employed torpedoes in 1866 for the defense of Venice, Pola, and other maritime and naval depots in the Adriatic, and has made important advances in their construction and use.

Far less expensive than any other accessory to harbor defense, none can be so promptly improvised, provided an expert body of men is available to apply and manage them; and though but an accessory to shore batteries, which protect them, they are perhaps quite as formidable an opponent to a hostile fleet as even the battery itself. The board suggests that the Engineer Battalion is the most fit agent for experimentally developing the system, and to furnish the personnel to apply it to actual defense, and it recommends that this duty be, under the direction of the board, assigned to it, its commanding officer becoming ex officio a member whenever this subject is on hand.

Fifthly. Obstructions. The first board of engineers, by which our existing system of sea-coast and harbor defense was originally devised, admitted even at that early day, (1816,) when wooden sailing ships were agents of naval attack, the necessity in certain cases of "obstructions." In a report of the board of 1840, just subsequent to the earliest successful applications of steam to ocean navigation, the following language is used with regard to them:

"If, after having occupied the shores in the narrow places in the best manner with batteries, we are of opinion that the temptation may induce the enemy, notwithstanding, to run the gauntlet, the obstruction of the channel must be resorted to. By this is not meant the permanent obstruction of the passage; such a resort, besides the great expense, might entail the ruin of the channel. The obstruction is meant to be the temporary closing by heavy floating masses."

The temptation to run the gauntlet, which a particularly fair wind and tide might offer to a fleet of sailing vessels, would be very slight, indeed, to that offered by the possession of a motor independent of wind and tide. It was the recent application of steam to vessels of war which thus brought up the subject so prominently before the board of 1840. But in this connection the change from wind to steam as a motor was scarcely more important than that from wood to iron as a material of construction. Though steam would carry with equal speed the unarmored and the armored vessel past shore batteries, the latter, comparatively invulnerable, need pay little heed to missiles which would cripple or destroy a wooden ship. Accordingly we find the necessity of some means of preventing this "running the gauntlet," whether by obstructions or torpedoes, or both, to be now universally admitted.

When, during the civil war, there was apprehension of foreign interference, the greatest solicitude was felt for the security of our great sea-ports under such a contingency. A commission of eminent civil engineers and others was appointed by the governor of the State of New York, in 1862, "to devise and report a plan for obstructing the passage of an enemy's ships of war into the harbor of New York through the Narrows." The plan thus devised would doubtless be an effectual barrier, but it was one which, very costly, would require many months to construct. The tendency of modern warfare is to become sudden, sharp, and brief; and an obstruction, to fulfill its intention, must, like guns and forts, be prepared beforehand for application at the moment of emergency, or it must be susceptible of improvisation from materials everywhere accessible.

* Twenty-four United States vessels in all were destroyed, and nine others badly damaged. In the beginning the use of torpedoes was a novelty little understood, but the rapidity with which its formidable character developed itself is shown by the statement that while during the year 1862 the confederates destroyed but a single United States vessel, they destroyed no less than eleven the last four months of the war.

The engineer officer in charge of the defenses of Washington in 1863, fully impressed with the importance of devising a channel obstruction which should fulfill the conditions, as well as of having a means of closing the approaches to Washington, by the Potomac, against iron-clads, obtained, through the recommendation of the Secretary of War, an appropriation of $300,000 for "floating obstructions" for the Potomac. Before attempting an application of this fund to actual construction, a new and thorough study of the subject was undertaken. The suggestions of former boards of engineers, and the plans of the New York commission, and many others, (particularly a very meritorious and original one of Mr. W. P. Trowbridge, formerly of the Corps of Engineers,) were consulted; and the subject was finally committed to Lieutenant-Colonel (now Brevet Brigadier-General) B. S. Alexander, of the engineers. The result of his studies, prolonged through nearly two years, was the development of a plan which was recommended by a board of engineers for experimental trial, and a section has accordingly been constructed, under the directions of the Chief of Engineers, to be submitted to trial in the Potomac River. In this plan, which has many peculiar features, a very minimum of timber necessary for flotation is employed, which, as also the iron-work, can be prepared and stored ready for emergency.

Sixthly. Floating batteries or harbor-defense vessels. The issue raised as to the employment of shore batteries or floating batteries has been so ably met in reports of former boards of engineers, that nothing further would need be said if that issue remain unchanged. In that case the proposition that floating batteries, of all defensive arrangements the most costly to prepare, the most expensive to maintain, and, withal, exceedingly perishable, are not needed where the waters to be defended can be thoroughly swept by shore batteries, would be as true now as it was twenty-five years ago. But we cannot assert that the issue remains unchanged. All now admit that shore batteries cannot alone certainly prevent the passage of hostile vessels which accept the risks of "running the gauntlet," and all equally admit that a well-devised armored "floating battery," combining the powers of the battery and the "ram," may be a very valuable accessory. A half-dozen light-draught "rams," invulnerable to artillery fire, stationed on the shoals of the east and west banks, would be in themselves exceedingly formidable to the hostile fleet which, to approach New York, must extend itself in single or double file to make its way up from Sandy Hook through the Narrows. They would be equally or more formidable to the same fleet assembled in the lower bay, while making preparations for an attack. The arguments for the relative claims of shore and floating batteries cannot, therefore, be considered the same as they were a few years ago, and it may be necessary to a good defense to have their aid in all our important harbors. What is the best form of such structures and the extent to which they should be employed are subjects which, though old in themselves, have become new, inasmuch as all the conditions are new. It does not seem to be within the sphere of the board to take up the questions involved in all their extent, but they have thought it proper to present the subject in its proper aspects.

Seventhly. It need scarcely be added that shore batteries, however perfectly constructed, are of no avail against their iron-clad antagonists, unless armed with the most powerful artillery. The Corps of Engineers has ever insisted upon the paramount importance of large calibers for its batteries. The 15-inch smooth-bore, the first successful step toward the modern increase of calibers, may be claimed as the result of the zealous labors of the Ordnance Department to meet the demands of the engineers; and the 20-inch gun was but another step taken expressly to provide an almost irresistible weapon for harbor defense. It is stated that the Prussians are employing the 50-ton gun of Krupp (an equivalent to our 20-inch gun) for the defense of the port of Kiel, and the desirableness of guns of such power for the defense of the great ports and harbors is indisputable. It is not the province of the board to indicate what particular kind of gun is to be preferred, but it feels called upon to note the necessity for their provision as the first and most indispensable element of harbor defense.

In presenting its report on the recent experimental firings, the board has thought it necessary to give in the foregoing a review of the means and requirements for coast defense as they now exist or as they may be developed, and to indicate the path in which progress may most rapidly be made.

While recommending a continued study and renewed experiments in iron construction, the board indulges a hope that through the defensive means just enumerated, fully developed, the construction of forts or batteries in a material so excessively expensive, and as yet so unsatisfactory, may be in a great degree avoided.

[Indorsements.]

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., May 7, 1869.

Respectfully submitted to the honorable Secretary of War.

The general conclusions drawn by the board from these experiments appear to me to be sound and prudent, and I think the propositions they have based upon them, as to the course to be pursued respecting our permanent coast defenses, eminently proper and timely.

It is proposed to instruct the board, in accordance with the several propositions made by them:

1. To continue examinations into the question of iron shields, scarps, &c.
2. To present specific projects for such additional barbette batteries for heaviest ordnance as they may find important for the greater security of our most important harbors against armored ships.
3. To present specific projects for mortar batteries, with the same object in view.
4. To present specific projects for the application of torpedoes, with the same object, and in connection therewith to make trials in their use, with the aid of the Engineer Battalion.
5. To prepare projects for floating obstructions and entanglements, in connection with the other means of defense.

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

[Confidential.]

Respectfully referred to the General of the Army for remark.
By order of the Secretary of War.

ED. SCHRIVER,
Inspector-General.

MAY 11, 1869.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, May 20, 1869.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

While the size of heavy guns is being daily increased, I do not deem it advisable to depend for protection against them on iron shields that, strong enough to-day, may be useless to-morrow.

For the defense of a channel or harbor against naval attempts our guns should be of the largest caliber, and scattered in earthen barbette batteries, with heavy intervening traverses, so as to avoid concentration of fire on them and to protect the gunners.

These batteries should be protected against land attacks by one or more central works, affording cover for all the necessary material and supplies, having masonry scarps or counterscarps, these scarps being entirely covered from exterior fire by a glacis.

We should make as much use of torpedoes as the rebels did during the late war, and mortars should be freely used for moral as well as real effect, wherever an attack from iron-clads is to be feared.

As there will be some points needing defense, but without room enough for earthen barbette batteries, the board should continue its studies of iron, proposing projects for further experiments whenever it deems them necessary.

The recommendations of the Chief Engineer are approved.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

Approved by the Secretary of War, May 22, 1869.

ED. SCHRIVER,
Inspector-General.

These principles were approved by the Chief of Engineers, the General of the Army, and the Secretary of War, and constitute the basis of the methods upon which our works are being constructed.

A critical examination of these methods will show that the work now being executed, and for which appropriations are now asked, is confined to strengthening the existing batteries of our works, whether these batteries are on top of our casemated works or adjacent and exterior to them, and to extending these batteries, and in some cases adding new batteries. This enlargement is rendered absolutely necessary by the increase in the size and dimensions of the modern ordnance.

The object of sea-coast defenses of the country is to prevent an enemy or his vessels from entering the convenient ports and laying under contribution or destroying property. In some cases they protect harbors or roadsteads where fleets could take refuge in stress of weather. In some cases they protect depots and arsenals of supply and construction. And in some cases they occupy strategic points of great importance in war.

That our sea-ports should be furnished with some kind of defense against the attack of an enemy on board of ship is not questioned by any one thoughtfully investigating the subject.

A discussion recently occurred in this House, growing out of our relations with Spain, as to the defense of New York Harbor. I had no doubt then, and I have none now, that the arrangements made by the Navy Department, in connection with the fortifications, would have made it impossible for the Spanish navy to have entered and remained in New York Harbor, even if the depth of water had been sufficient to float their largest vessels with their armament on them. I think our gallant seamen, commanded by brave and skillful officers, even in the few monitors and wooden vessels we have, would have been more than a match for the Spanish navy. At any rate, our most experienced officers were willing to make the trial.

But in England, our old rival, we have a naval power immensely superior to Spain, not only in vessels and armament, but in men. Examine for a few minutes a few of the vessels and the armanent of the British navy.

Take the Monarch and her class. Her armor, at water-line and above, is 7 inches amidships, and 5 inches on the bow and stern, and below water-line there are 6 inches of armor. Of this class are the Hercules and the Sultan.

The Devastation, and the Thunderer and Fury of her class, have 12 inches of armor amidships, and 8 and 9 inches on bow and stern, respectively.

The Audacious and her five companion-ships (the Iron Duke, the Vanguard, the Invincible, the Swiftsure, and the Triumph) have an armor of 8 inches amidships.

The Glatton has an armor of 12 inches not only amidships, but on bow and stern down to water-line, and 10 inches of armor below water-line.

The Cyclops and her class, (consisting of the Hecate, the Hydra, and the Gorgon,) have 8 inches of armor.

Here are seventeen strong vessels, just completed or being built, with an armor ranging from 6 to 12 inches throughout, backed by the best material, ranging from 12 to 18 inches in thickness.

The heaviest guns of the Monarch, the Devastation, and the Glatton are rifled, weighing from 25 to 35 tons each, and carrying a ball weighing from 600 to 800 ponnds. (See table on page 1406 for details.)

It is objected that these vessels draw so much water that they cannot enter our principal harbors. Do not deceive yourselves. England does not construct these vessels for amusement, but for use, whenever she has occasion, and in their construction our situation in all its relations was taken into the account. They were built with a view to entering our harbors whenever a difficulty should arise between Great Britain and the United States, with a view of laying our sea-board cities under contribution. And in case of war, we have no such armored vessels as England has. We cannot afford, nor is it economical or good policy for a nation like this, to expend such an enormous amount as we should have to do to match her in size and number of armored vessels. Any one of several of the large vessels of the British navy cost between two and three millions, built with cheap labor. In this country a vessel of the class of the Monarch, Devastation, and the Hercules would cost from three to five millions each. The Achilles did cost, for the ship and engines alone, without incidentals, an amount of £458,000.

England counts her armored vessels by scores, and the largest of these can enter Boston, Portland, Newport, New London, and many of them New York Harbor, and a score of harbors on our coast.

Tabulated statement of certain particulars respecting the Monarch, Devastation, Audacious, Glatton, and Cyclops classes of iron-clads of British navy.

Here it will be seen that Portland has 50 feet of water, Portsmouth 40, Boston 24, New London 42, New York 29 at high water, Philadelphia 26, and Baltimore 27.

Now, the Devastation, with full armament, draws only 26 feet, the Audacious 22, the Glatton 20 feet, and six of the Cyclops class only 16 feet each. The highest naval authority in England states that the Devastation carries two 30-ton guns in each turret, and throws 600-pounder shot. She has a mean speed of 12½ knots per hour, and carries 1,600 tons of coal. "This would enable her to cross the Atlantic, fight an action, and afterward return to her home port without renewing her stock of fuel."

The only protection to our largest sea-board cities against this class of vessels with this armament, are the fortifications in which are mounted heavy guns. That these are the best protection all military authority and experience prove. (See Executive Document No. 271, Forty-first Congress, second session. Recommendations of Major-General A. A. Humphreys, approved by General Sherman.)

This is also proved in the attack of the French and English ships on Sebastopol, when the result of 1,244 guns firing 50,000 rounds, was dismounting only 28 guns all in open batteries. And Fort Sumter, which was built entirely of brick-work, only 5 feet thick about the embrasures, and at no part more than 11 feet thick, and in an engagement of two and a half hours with eight monitors and one iron-plated ship, carrying 15-inch and 11-inch ordnance, it appeared that out of about eighty-three shots, at an average range of 1,200 yards, only fifty-eight struck the fort at all, there being only one instance of three shots striking near together.

On the 7th of April, 1863, Admiral Du Pont attacked Fort Sumter with seven monitors, the Keokuk and the New Ironsides. After a gallant attack he withdrew, finding no impression made upon the fort. He says:

The monitors were able to get within easy range of Fort Sumter, at distances varying from five hundred and fifty to eight hundred yards. No ship had been exposed to the severest fire of the enemy over forty minutes, and yet, in that brief period, five of the iron-clads were wholly or partially disabled; disabled, too, in that which was most essential to our success—I mean in their armament, or power of inflicting injury by their guns. The other iron-clads, (two out of seven) though struck many times severely, were still able to use their guns, but I am convinced that in all probability in another thirty minutes they, too, would have been likewise disabled.

Captain Drayton, who commanded the Passaic, says:

At the fourth shot from 11-inch gun I was struck in quick succession in the lower part of the turret by two heavy shot, which bulged in its plates and beams, and forcing together the rails on which the 11-inch carriage worked, rendered it wholly useless for the remainder of the action, several hours being necessary to put it again in working order. Soon after it was discovered there was something the matter with the turret itself, which could not be moved. A little after a very heavy rifle-shot struck the upper edge of the turret, broke all of its eleven plates, and then, glancing upward, took the pilot-house, yet with such force as to make an indentation of two and a half inches, extending nearly the whole length of the shot.

Owing to the delays caused by the various accidents, ending in the entire disabling of one gun, I was only able to fire four times from the 11-inch and nine from the 15-inch gun. There was some loss of time, also, from the necessity of using the sectional rammer, as the fire was all around, and required the ports to be kept closed.

Except a few scars, I could not perceive, either yesterday or this morning, when I had a very good view of its lower face, that the fort was in the least injured.

My experience at Fort McAllister satisfied me that the decks were not strong enough, and this of Fort Sumter that the pilot-house is not capable of withstanding heavy shot for any length of time, and even throws a doubt on the turret itself, or at least its machinery.

Captain Rodgers says of the Weehawken:

Two or three heavy shots struck the side armor near the same place. They have so broken the iron that it only remains in splintered fragments upon the spot; much of it can be picked off by hand, and the wood is exposed. The deck was pierced so as to make a hole, through which water ran into the vessel, but it was not large.

Thirty-six bolts were broken in the turret, and a good many in the pilot-house, but as these are concealed by an iron lining, I have no means of knowing how many.

Captain Worden says of the Montauk:

After testing the weight of the enemy's fire, and observing the obstructions, I am led to believe that Charleston cannot be taken by the naval force now present; and that, had the attack been continued, it could not have failed to result in disaster.

Lieutenant-Commander Cushman says of the Montauk:

Hits on side-armor, four. One of these is severe, detaching the entire after-starboard section of plating about three-eighths of an inch from the backing. The section will require refastening.

Captain Ammen says of the Patapsco:

After the fifth discharge of the rifle the gun was rendered useless. Another question of great importance, as relates to their efficient employment, is the character of the battery. If it is proposed to batter down forts with a 15-inch gun, then it is quite plain that we have to come within distances at which heavy ordnance, if employed in heavy batteries against us, cannot fail in the end to injure, or perhaps, disable us. Owing to the early disabling of the rifle, and the various discomfitures referred to, only five projectiles were fired from each gun.

Commander George W. Rodgers, commanding the Catskill, says:

I was surprised to find, even with this severe fire, that these vessels could be so much injured in so short a time.

The Keokuk sank from the injuries she received.

Admiral Du Pont, in his report dated June 3, 1863, says:

I must take leave to remind the Department that ability to endure is not a sufficient element wherewith to gain victories; that endurance must be accompanied with a corresponding power to inflict injury upon the enemy. And I will improve the present occasion to repeat the expression of a conviction that the weakness of the monitor class of vessels in this latter important particular is fatal to their attempts against fortifications having outlying obstructions, as at the Ogeechee and at Charleston; or against other fortifications upon elevations, as at Fort Darling; or against any modern fortifications before which they must anchor, or be at rest, and receive much more than they can return. The results of the trials in the Ogeechee were most discouraging. Two attacks successively made by the monitor with gun-boats and a mortar-vessel had no effect on a fort of seven guns, protected with piling and torpedoes. This was followed by a bombardment of eight hours, with three monitors, the gun-boats, and three mortar-vessels, and as before with a like result. The injuries to the monitors were extensive, and their offensive powers found to be feeble in dealing with forts, particularly earthworks.

The following is extracted from a joint report made by the commanders of the monitors, April 24, 1863:

After the experience gained under the fire of the enemy, we were unanimously of opinion that a renewal of the attack would be unwise in the extreme, and for the following reason: Our vessels had been very much injured before passing the first of the three lines of defenses which protect Charleston, and perhaps, considering the obstacles to be met with farther up, not the strongest of the three. In receiving these injuries they had not been able to do any to Fort Sumter, at least sufficient to slacken its fire. When, in addition to this, it had been proved that any heavy blow on the turret was very apt to disorder and stop it; that our side armor and decks were penetrable, and the pilot-house, where is the steering-apparatus, and from which is the only lookout, could be made untenable, as two of them to a great extent had been, it is scarcely surprising that we should have arrived at the above conclusions. As it has also been stated that our vessels came out of the action almost unharmed, we will here mention some of the injuries received by them, which will, we think, go to show that such was not the case, and that it would have been out of the question to renew the action on the next day, if at all, when we consider that, although again liable to the same fire as the first, in their after condition they would have been infinitely less able to endure it.

1. Passaic.—A large piece of brassing under the turret broken off, owing to which, and its being forced over, the turret could not be moved for some time, and has not worked well since. The gun-carriage of the 11-inch gun disabled until the next afternoon, and the top of the pilot-house forced up so as to expose the inside to shot, and not got into place until late the next day.

2. Weehawken.—Side-armor broken through, exposing the wood. The flange supporting the gun-platform of 11-inch gun broken; smoke-stack very much injured, and both this and the turret greatly weakened from the loss of bolts. The latter also for a time stopped.

3. Patapsco.—Rifled gun disabled at fifth fire; smoke-stack penetrated in several places through the upper part of armor, out of which were forced forty bolts, rendering the whole structure very insecure until strengthened again; besides this the turret had been stopped for a time.

4. Nantucket.—Fifteen-inch gun lost at the third fire, owing to blow on turret jamming the port-stopper, which could not be moved afterward. The turret stopped several times, besides severe injury to smoke-stack and deck. The concussion-box in this short time lost eight bolts, and the turret was made to move with great difficulty.

5. Nahant.—Lost seventy-six bolts from the turret and pilot-house; the latter very much injured. The steering-gear deranged and the plates started. The braces that hold down the inner gun-tracks and brace of turret knocked off, and turret rendered immovable and not cleared until five the following afternoon. Even at present, after long repairs, it can only be made to revolve very slowly with thirty pounds of steam.

We beg to add, in further support of our views expressed against a renewal of the attack, that the liability of the guns to become disabled on occasions which require steady use has been shown, as well as that the turret almost invariably refuses to work after receiving heavy blows from shot, not only because the consequent bulging injures the machinery, but from its being pushed from the perpendicular. In addition, the very slow fire possible from the 15-inch gun, and the fact that, to be effective against stone walls, it must be brought so near as to take away from the impenetrable character of the iron-clads, are considerations of great moment to all those who wish to see these vessels in the highest degree effective; nor have we, unfortunately, reason to believe that the batteries or turrets will on any future occasion, when exposed to the fire of heavy guns, show more offensive power or endurance than was the case at Sumter.

The report from which the foregoing extracts have been made was signed by Captains Drayton, John Rodgers, Ammen, G. W. Rodgers, Fairfax, and Downes.

As a still further protection a system of torpedoes has been perfected to protect our harbors, and can be so laid to protect them against vessels as powerful even as the Monarch and Devastation. The plan and arrangement are so simple and have been so thoroughly tested as to leave no doubt of success. These torpedoes may be taken up and removed elsewhere with great facility and with perfect safety, by disconnecting the battery on the land within the fortifications.

So that all these fortifications at our principal harbors for the protection of our commerce and cities on the sea-coast are vitally important, for they make the torpedo system available and perfect.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken of this more at length because it is of recent origin and of great importance, and the committee have placed in this bill a small appropriation for the purpose of purchasing the cable and other apparatus. We think it a wise economy.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time already than I should. But while the amount recommended by the committee to be appropriated in this bill is small in comparison with other years, and almost insignificant in comparison with amounts appropriated for other objects, still the Committee on Appropriations deemed it wise to give the general considerations that govern them.

The committee in this matter, as in all others, invite earnest scrutiny and investigation, and desire careful consideration, with an earnest purpose to reduce the public expenditures and lessen the taxes and burdens of the people.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and a message was received from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, with sundry amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I should like to have the Clerk read the testimony of General Sherman before the Committee on Military Affairs of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. On the subject of fortifications, please to state what fortifications or works of defense that are now in process of construction should be completed at an early day. Here is a list for which appropriations were made last year.

General SHERMAN, [going over the list.] Some of these forts, if I had to defend them, I would go outside to do it.

Fort Preble is of little use.

Fort Scammel is not much better.

Fort Warren is an important point, because it covers the entrance to Boston Harbor; but it is substantially finished.

Fort Winthrop is, also, substantially finished, so that you can dispense with heavy appropriations for that.

Fort Independence the same.

Fort on Dutch Island, in Narragansett Bay, is about as much use as if it were in the Florida Channel.

Fort at Willet's Point will be, in connection with Fort Schuyler, a very important work in the event of the Government succeeding in deepening the channel by Hell Gate to the extent of thirty feet. If that is done it will, in my judgment, reverse the foreign commerce of New York, and bring it all through Long Island Sound, past Hell Gate to the East River, allowing such ships as the Great Eastern and the largest ships of the world to come through Long Island Sound. In that event the heavy iron-clad fleets of England could come through the sound, and we would have to have a fort at Willet's Point; but at present, and until that is done, I would not spend a cent on it.

Fort Hamilton—there is no expense needed there.

Fort Tompkins—there is some expense needed there to finish it up.

Battery Hudson—I do not know anything about it.

Fort Delaware, in the Delaware River—there is a tower in the middle of the Delaware River, and I think it is substantially finished.

Fort McHenry—it is not necessary, I think, to spend any more money there.

Fort Foote—of course not any there.

Fort Washington—that would be a waste of money. God only knows what we want a fort there for. No iron-clad ship can get up the Potomac River; we can hardly get vessels drawing thirteen feet of water up the river.

Fort Monroe—that is substantially finished.

Fort Moultrie—let it slide.

Fort Sumter—let it stand as a monument. *The great iron-clad ships of the world cannot now enter southern harbors, and there is no danger there.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move, pro forma, to strike out the last word. Inasmuch as I have had some connection with fortification bills as reported from the Committee on Appropriations for several years past, it is proper, Mr. Chairman, I should say a word before proceeding further in our action upon the pending proposition. As it seems to be conceded on all hands some reduction of expenses must be made by the present Congress, fortifications have been frequently suggested as one of the measures upon which a reduction could be properly made. In fact it has been argued in many quarters entitled to consideration we ought this year to dispense with all appropriations for fortifications. I do not agree to this latter proposition. While I do agree we ought to appropriate as little as possible for any purpose where we have any discretion in regard to the amount, still some appropriation of this sort is necessary, not only for a proper defense of the country in case of war, but as a matter of strategic policy by which all other nations are to be impressed that we do not intend to be caught unprepared in case of any great or unforeseen emergency.

I think, at all events, we ought not to entirely abandon work on our fortifications even under the great pressure for reduction in the expenditures of the Government which we are now under. In my judgment we would be almost justified in borrowing a small amount of money if necessary for the purpose of continuing in a modified form this system of fortification.

Now, it must be borne in mind, Mr. Chairman, we have the largest water-front, if you will allow me to use the expression, of any government in the world. We have more harbors, more frontier exposed upon the ocean, than any other government, large or small; and therefore it is absolutely necessary, if we wish to continue our present system of fortification on a scale which will be of any advantage to the country, we should expend a considerable sum of money annually for that purpose. I know it may be said while we continue at peace there is no necessity for these appropriations, and that it is so much money thrown away; but while that is said with great plausibility in time of peace, we must not forget that in case we are involved in war, in any difficulty with a foreign power, making resort to arms either probable or necessary, we will then find our harbors entirely exposed, without any fortifications or proper defense for such an emergency; and then everybody will say, and say justly, that Congress has been derelict in regard to the defense of the country.

The only object I have in seeking the floor is to say that, anxious as I am to cut off expenses everywhere where it can properly be done, I do feel it to be my duty, with my knowledge on the subject, arising from the opportunities I have had for careful investigation of all the facts, to declare we ought at least to vote the aggregate amount of money reported by the Committee on Appropriations in this bill. I shall cheerfully, therefore, unless some strong reason which I have not heard shall be assigned to the contrary, vote to sustain the action of the committee in reporting this bill.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, I did think that if there was any one of the appropriation bills that we could dispense with this would be the one; and I am sorry that my economical friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] has seen fit on this occasion, as well as upon the bill just disposed of, to set himself apparently against a reduction of expenditures and against economy. Now, after what we have heard from the General of the Army, to make appropriations for these old forts, which are of no use even in time of war, and certainly of no use in time of peace, strikes me as very unwise on the part of this House. I think the temper of the country does not justify us in making an appropriation of nearly one million dollars for these old and useless forts.

I do not know how these estimates are made or who makes them. We never have any reasons given for the appropriations, except that they have been estimated at so much. Certainly the Engineer, or whoever else may make these estimates, has a very strange way of reaching his conclusions. In these estimates we never have any odd cents or odd dollars or odd hundreds of dollars. The sums estimated are always $20,000 or $30,000, or $50,000, or some other round sum for each of these works. This fact is, I think, an indication that the making of these estimates is mere guess-work, and that the only object of the appropriations is to maintain in idleness a certain set of officers who feel no responsibility for the reckless estimates they make.

After the evidence of the General of the Army, as read at the Clerk's desk, in regard to the uselessness of these forts, I cannot see how the Committee on Appropriations can recommend that these appropriations be made. Among the appropriations recommended by the committee is one of $20,000 for Fort Moultrie, Charleston Harbor; yet this is a fort of which General Sherman has said he would "let it slide." The bill also proposes an appropriation of $20,000 for Fort Sumter, and appropriations of $20,000, $30,000, and $40,000 for various other forts which the General of the Army says are utterly useless and should be abandoned. I hope the gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. STARKWEATHER] will be able to give the House some satisfactory explanation of the reason for proposing these appropriations for forts which are pronounced by the General of the Army to be unnecessary, and if he was called upon to defend them he would prefer to do so from the outside.

Mr. NIBLACK. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I renew the amendment. The Committee of the Whole having now reached the first item of the bill, I am very willing to reply to what has been said. It is true that General Sherman speaks of fortifications that need no further appropriations; but I wish to call attention to some points in connection with his testimony.

I think General Sherman must be incorrectly reported in this testimony; I know some part of it must be incorrect; and I will state my reasons for this belief. On the twenty-second page he speaks of Fort Tompkins and Fort Hamilton, forts in New York Harbor, the most important forts for the protection of New York City. Without these fortifications for the defense of that harbor any one of the iron-clads of which I have spoken could in one hour do more damage than all the fortifications of this country have cost for twenty years. The only protection we have for New York Harbor is in these forts, which some gentlemen here are disposed to characterize as worthless, but which General Sherman did not so pronounce. I speak to some gentlemen who are well acquainted with New York Harbor, and I propose to show that General Sherman must be incorrectly reported. On the twenty-second page he is reported as saying:

> Fort Hamilton—there is no expense needed; Fort Tompkins—there is some expense needed to finish it up.

Now turn to the twenty-fourth page, and you will find that General Sherman, speaking again in regard to Fort Hamilton and Fort Tompkins, states:

> These are the two great forts at the Narrows. They are the most important forts in the United States at this moment; and I think you ought to give the Chief Engineer what he asks for.

Thus on the twenty-second page General Sherman is reported as saying that nothing is needed; and on the twenty-fourth page he says distinctly that these are the most important forts in the country, and that we ought to appropriate all the Engineer asks for. General Sherman must be presumed to know what he is talking about. I say that he is evidently misreported.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Let me state to the gentleman that this testimony, after being written out, was submitted to General Sherman and revised by him.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Then, General Sherman changed his mind entirely between the time when he gave the testimony on page 22 and the time when he gave that on page 24.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the next question which was put to General Sherman, and his answer to it:

> Question. Your opinion generally is that the work had better be suspended on these fortifications.
> Answer. Yes; if you want to save money at this particular juncture.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Yes; we can save money by suspending all public works, all improvements, by adjourning Congress, and going home. If the mere saving of money is the object, it can be accomplished in that way. But when gentlemen talk about worthless fortifications I call their attention to what General Sherman himself says, and what the Chief Engineer will tell you, that these are the most important fortifications in the country.

Now, it is said that Fort Preble and the other forts on the Maine coast are worthless. Why, there is not a strategic point in the country more important to us than Portland Harbor, which is defended by these forts. The depth of water there, as nobody disputes, is such that even the largest iron-clads could go into the harbor but for the fortifications.

Now these very fortifications were laid out by the most able engineers of the country, on the advice of the Secretary of War, and I have here in a pamphlet before me a clear and able statement of this matter, showing the great importance of the fortifications.

Now what is Portland Harbor? Portland is a rich city. It is the key to all our commerce in that part of New England; and the Grand Trunk Railroad, with one terminus at Portland and the other in the Canadas. That railroad connects with every railroad running in that part of the country, and Portland has been regarded from the time it had a commerce until this day as the most important strategic point on all our New England coast. The importance of these fortifications has been indorsed by such engineers as General Totten, General Humphreys and all his associates, by our former Secretaries of War, by our present Secretary of War, and by General Sherman himself. Without these fortifications, any of these British iron-clads could go into Portland Harbor, and lay that city under contribution, cutting off her railroad connection without hinderance. We have no Navy that could prevent it. Now we ask for a very moderate appropriation, much less than was estimated for, but such as is required by the changes in heavy ordnance. You have to make a change in the matter of the arrangement of heavy guns in these fortifications. And no man who looks at the Chief Engineer's report and sees what has been done from time to time, can dispute the necessity of these changes in order to protect this strategic point so important to our safety as a nation.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire to congratulate my friends from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] and Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] on the conversion they have undergone in what I believe to be the right direction; that is, a willingness to take advice when given by gentlemen competent to offer it. If I recollect rightly, when we were discussing in the Committee of the Whole the Army bill, that has just been passed by the House, neither of those gentlemen treated the opinions given by the Commander of the Army as against the reduction of the Army, as being worth much, when it came in conflict with their own opinion; and every time that question came up they voted against the recommendation of that gentleman. But now they bring him up as the highest authority that can be quoted in this House. They agree with the statements he made and the opinions he has expressed as to the advisability of allowing these works to go to destruction and decay. Now, it is the Engineer Department whose opinions they despise; and the opinions of General Sherman are to be taken as decisive. I prefer, sir, to be guided in my vote on this bill by the views of the skilled and scientific experts who have made the science of engineering a specialty.

Now, I want to say one word as to the statement which has been made that iron-clads of any size and carrying large guns cannot enter our southern harbors and rivers. Let me remind gentlemen of what occurred a few years ago with reference to some of these harbors and rivers during our late war. When our own iron-clads attempted to ascend the James River to attack the city of Richmond, nothing could have prevented the capture of that city but the presence of the fortifications erected by the Confederate government. But the time is not so very remote, sir, but that every member of the committee can recollect what was the result of that effort on the part of the Navy of the United States, the vessels that were sent there being stopped by the artillery and ordnance of the Confederate States behind the fortifications at Drury's Bluff, put there to defend the James River and prevent the passage of those vessels.

And there is a parallel to this in the case of the Potomac River; commencing with Fortress Monroe, which commands the entrances to the Elizabeth River, the James River, and the Potomac River. Gentlemen will recollect that during the war of 1812 the ships of the navy of England passed by the very slight fortifications at that time existing, passed up the Potomac River, and succeeded in bringing vessels with draught and guns sufficiently heavy to take the capital of our country and lay this city of Washington and our public buildings in waste, invading and destroying even the residence of our President and our Capitol.

Mr. STORM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. STORM. Is it true, as General Sherman says, that Fortress Monroe is finished and needs no appropriation?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. No, sir; General Sherman says that it is substantially finished. I agree with him so far that what has been done has been substantially done, if that is what he means. But I do not believe that General Sherman intends to assert, because he would not make an assertion so fallacious, and easily disproved, that that fortification was so nearly finished that it would be safe to abandon all further work upon it.

I hope that gentlemen will consider very carefully before they decide to refuse to vote any appropriations whatever for keeping these fortifications in condition. It is true that they may not be necessary now, when everything looks peaceful. There seems no chance for a disturbance with any foreign power. But should any difficulty arise, it would be possible, I say here without any fear of contradiction, for the vessels of any maritime power with which we might be brought into conflict to enter our southern harbors and ascend our rivers.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For Fort Adams, Newport Harbor, $20,000.

Mr. COBURN. I move to strike out the last word. The committee will see that this appropriation bill does not cover so many great points as the number of paragraphs would seem to imply. For instance, the items for Portland, Portsmouth, Boston, Narragansett Bay, New London, New York, and Philadelphia, cover two whole pages in minor designations of forts and works. The next item is for Baltimore; from there the skip is to Forts Foote and Washington, and then to the mouth of the Potomac; from there to Charleston, South Carolina; then to Savannah, then to Southern Florida, and then to the mouth of the Mississippi River, and thence to San Francisco; so that the points provided for by the bill are not very numerous.

Now, I think that everybody must agree that our great cities and strategic points must be defended and well taken care of. In case of foreign war we must have fortifications, and we must have heavy guns at important and vulnerable places. I will call the attention of the committee to General Sherman's testimany on those points, because it is not just that this opinion should be quoted and misunderstood. He is for but a few works. On page 24 of his testimony the committee will get a comprehensive view of what he intended to say. I quote the question and answer, which no one can misunderstand or criticise:

The CHAIRMAN. Then the other point follows. Is any important point left in such a state as that, in case of war, we could not prepare it in a short time for defense?

General SHERMAN. I think I have a right, as a military man, and also as a citizen of the United States, to say that the whole problem of sea-coast defense has changed within my day. The building of railroads, whereby five, ten, or fifteen thousand men may be picked up and thrown from one point to another with great rapidity, and with absolute certainty, takes away from the country all fear of invasion by any nation on earth. We do not fear now the landing on our coast of the armies of any people. The only object of fortifications on the sea-board is, therefore, to protect some rich cities like New York or Boston, which are very tempting to an enemy like England that might dash in, lay the city under contribution, and get out before we could wake up. We do not fear the disembarkation on our coast at Baltimore, or at Pensacola, or in North Carolina, of any enemy, as we did in 1812. Nothing of that kind can now happen. There is no remote apprehension of it. Therefore I would cease this extraordinary expenditure of money at every little place where a schooner, or a brig, or an ordinary ship can run in; and I would only guard the most important harbors of refuge and those great cities which alone can tempt a foreign enemy to make an attack on our coast.

Now, there is the general principle on which this testimony is based, and wherever we find a great harbor or city that is bare of defense, we should make appropriations for that purpose in a judicious and progressive manner. We need great guns more than works of defense on the coast, and both are very desirable at some points.

Now, I have no great fault to find with the appropriations called for in this bill, since they are in the main for exposed important places. I will call the attention of the committee to what General Humphreys says about the exposed condition of some of our harbors. The question had been previously put to General Sherman, in the first place, as to whether the large iron-clads of foreign countries could get into our ports. His opinion is that they could not; but he does not pretend to be a scientific man in that respect. General Humphreys does not agree with him, and says on page 112:

Question. State whether or not the largest-sized guns can be brought to bear from fleets against our present works of defense; whether in most important points the water is not too shallow to admit the approach of vessels carrying those heaviest and most formidable guns.

Answer. It is not. The cases where these ships cannot approach are exceptions instead of being the rule. They can enter Portland, Portsmouth, (which has a navy-yard,) Boston, Narragansett Bay, (a great strategic place,) New York, and Philadelphia. The very largest ships cannot enter Baltimore; but armed ships can get up there. It has 24 feet of water. But still these smaller vessels carry the heaviest guns. All these places can be reached by armed ships, carrying the heaviest guns. The Devastation is a recently built ship, with the most powerful artillery. It is somewhat approaching the monitor class. I think its draught is 26 feet; but ships can be built with a less draught of water that will carry these big guns.

Q. Would they be seaworthy?

A. Yes. I think these larger ships of Great Britain have 25 feet draught. They can, therefore, pass up the entrance to the James River at Fort Monroe. They cannot go to Charleston; but armed ships can go there, because our own ships have gone there. The secondary armed ships, armed with the heaviest guns, can go to Charleston and Savannah. They can get into the lower bay of Mobile and into Key West. The heaviest ships cannot get to New Orleans; but armed ships carrying the heaviest guns can get there. As to San Francisco, there is no question about the depth there. There is also ample depth at San Diego.

Again, on page 113, he says:

I desire to reply a little more fully than I did this morning to your inquiry whether thickly plated or armored ships with the powerful modern guns draw too much water to enter our principal harbors.

The most powerful ships now built, such as the Devastation class, draw 26½ feet of water at the stern, and about 4 feet less at the bow. They are to carry the 35-ton 12-inch rifled gun. The Monarch class draw about 26 feet at the stern and carry the 25-ton 12-inch rifled gun.

The other classes, carrying from the 25-ton 12-inch rifled gun to the 10-inch and 9-inch rifled gun of a penetrating power equal to our 15-inch smooth-bore gun, draw various depths down to about 16 feet aft.

There are small armored vessels drawing only 7 feet of water, carrying one 9-inch rifle, (which possesses the same penetrating power as our 15-inch smooth-bore at 1,000 yards distance.) The gun can be lowered down to the keel of the vessel in rough weather.

Our own most powerful iron-clads, with 14-inch side-armor, carrying four of our most powerful guns, draw 18 feet of water.

All these classes could therefore enter—

1. The Penobscot River; 2. The Kennebec River; 3. Portland Harbor; 4. Portsmouth (New Hampshire) Harbor; 5. Boston Harbor; 6. Narragansett Bay, (a great strategic position;) 7. New London Harbor; 8. New York Harbor; 9. Philadelphia Harbor, (except those drawing 25 feet and over;) 10. Hampton Roads, (the entrance to James River and the harbor of Norfolk;) 11. The Tortugas, (strategic position;) and 12. San Francisco Harbor.

A large part of such ships could enter the harbors of—

1. Baltimore; 2. Washington; 3. Charleston; 4. The mouth of the Savannah River; 5. The harbor of Key West; 6. Pensacola Harbor; 7. The lower harbor of Mobile; 8. Ship Island Harbor; 9. The harbor of New Orleans; 10. The harbor of San Diego, and 11. The mouth of the Columbia River.

We might dispense, it is true, with some of the appropriations here this year, but the testimony of General Humphreys goes to show the bad policy of dispensing too generally with appropriations as to fortifications. He says in reply to a question put by myself:

In reply to your inquiry as to what reduction could be made in the estimate for fortifications, in view of the actual and anticipated falling off in the amount of revenue collected, I have to state that the estimates for the service of the Engineer Department were submitted in August last, before the disturbance in monetary affairs of the country had occurred or was generally felt. The estimate for fortifications amounted to about $3,400,000.

Under the resolution of the House of Representatives, returning the estimates for revision, those for fortifications were reduced to $1,400,000, and subsequently upon a conference with the member of the Committee on Appropriations having charge of this subject, and afterward with that committee, the estimates were still further reduced to about $1,000,000. This sum provides for a very moderate progress on the defenses of most of the chief harbors of the country.

As to the inquiry whether all expenditure upon these works might not be temporarily suspended, I must advise to the contrary, in view both of the incomplete state of the defenses and the unfinished condition of the works. The half-finished earth-work, exposed for any length of time to the weather, would be materially injured, as would be also the unfinished masonry; and the machinery and other expensive means and appliances used in the construction of the fortifications, commonly termed "plant" by contractors, would be seriously impaired by disuse.

A large amount of machinery, derricks, and other material has been collected, and is on hand at these works, and will be a total loss if the work is abandoned. This certainly would be wasteful policy.

Let me say, in addition, that the estimates of the Chief of Engineers for these fortifications have been cut down from $3,400,000 to something over $900,000, a very large reduction, and one which, I think, fairly meets the emergency.

Some of the points named in the bill may be omitted; such as Forts Foote, Washington, Moultrie, and Sumter. But they are not yet reached.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I renew the amendment. My purpose in calling attention to the testimony of General Sherman was not to assail especially the report of the committee. I am not aware that the testimony already read from General Sherman does seriously assail any appropriation made here, except the appropriations for Fort Foote and Fort Washington on the Potomac River. In respect to these, General Sherman says:

Fort Foote—of course not any there.

Fort Washington—that would be a waste of money. God only knows what we want a fort there for. No iron-clad ship can get up the Potomac River; we can hardly get vessels drawing 13 feet of water up the river.

Now, of course I recognize that it is desirable to have some fortifications on important harbors where there are important and valuable interests that might be assailed by vessels of war coming into those ports; but, as I think most of the members of the committee know, there is no such thing as finishing any one of these forts. After a fort has once been begun it never is completed, so that the Department is asking here every year for more money for the purpose of completing the fort.

Now it is pretty obvious that we cannot defend our coast line or our frontier line by forts so as to prevent a foreign power, if it should happen to make war on us, from landing troops on our shores. But General Sherman testifies that modern warfare has rendered any apprehension of that kind out of the question.

In case we should anticipate a foreign war we have nothing to fear by way of foreign invasion. I suppose there is possibly some apprehension that foreign vessels of war might attempt to attack some of our sea-ports, and so far as there is any reasonable apprehension of that, unquestionably they ought to be reasonably guarded.

But this idea that we are to maintain forty, or fifty, or sixty, or one hundred forts all along the line of our sea-coasts, which can be of very little earthly use, probably never used against a foreign foe, and if we should ever have a rebellion or secession in this country they would only be of help to that portion of the country that might secede—that, I think, would be a waste of money. It would be simply continuing works that will never be of any service to the country as a means of defense, only furnishing places where, year after year, we can put money out of the Treasury by way of appropriation.

Now, if it can be shown, as it doubtless has been shown in many of these cases, that there is a need for some of these appropriations, there should be no objections to making them. It is a very agreeable thing that the Committee on Appropriations have reduced the estimates for this purpose from over $3,000,000 to less than $1,000,000. It has occurred to me that if we are ever going to come to a peace basis, if we suppose that wars are ever to end, if this glorious era, which the republican party has advertised itself as having inaugurated, when all national differences are to be reconciled and adjusted by arbitration, is to continue, then the time has come when we may at least stop throwing away money upon fortifications which, in the main, are useless.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word or two in regard to some of the points which have been made in this debate. I entirely concur with the aspirations of gentlemen about me who desire to reduce the appropriations. But I hope we will not in any of our reductions of appropriations determine just simply to neglect public necessities.

Of course I know that it is possible to lay aside this appropriation bill altogether, and not pass one for a single year. Perhaps we may safely do so for half a dozen years. If no war came we might do it forever. But in the midst of our work of reduction we were compelled to inquire whether it was entirely safe for us to leave out of view the possibility of a war. It seemed to us that it would be unstatesman-like to say that we would do nothing whatever in reference to the possibility of a war along our coasts.

Gentlemen have said two or three things about these appropriations being in round sums, that there are not odd hundreds of dollars, or odd dollars, or odd cents. That is because we are continuing work on all of these fortifications; we are not completing any of them. Therefore we appropriate a round sum. We have, in almost every case, cut down below the sum estimated. Of course the cutting down was in some measure hap-hazard.

We said to the Chief of Engineers that instead of giving him the $3,600,000 he asked for we would give him but $1,000,000, and that he might distribute that $1,000,000 where he could convince us it was most wise and proper to distribute it. And the distribution was made in this wise: We give $125,000 for torpedoes. We believe that the appropriation of money for carrying out the new system of torpedoes recently invented, which is merely the laying in store of material for griddling our harbors across with torpedoes that shall destroy any vessel that may attempt to enter them against our will, is a wise investment, and not a wasteful consumption of money. We give $60,000 more for carrying on the surveys in the Territories under military supervision. That really does not belong to the fortification bill, although it annually comes in this bill. Then we give $75,000 for any contingencies that may arise; where any work may be injured by flood or anything that may happen, by exposure or otherwise. That makes $260,000 of the $994,000 appropriated by this bill.

The remaining sum appropriated, which is not large—only a little over $600,000—is distributed to two classes of forts only; first, those of commercial importance, like the forts in or near great cities; and, secondly, those of recognized strategic importance in case of a foreign war. If there be any forts appropriated for in this bill that do not come within one or the other of these categories, then they should be stricken out. So far as my personal opinion is concerned, I see no particular reason why we should appropriate any sum of money for Fort Washington, on the Potomac. That might be stricken out, and a few others, perhaps. But let us keep in all the rest; let us see that the important commercial and strategical points are fortified.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I renew it, for the purpose of saying that I desire to vote with the committee and with the majority; but I find it a little difficult to follow them in this bill. I want my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] to tell me how I can go home and explain to my people why I voted $20,000 for Fort Washington, when General Sherman, in whom the people have great confidence, says that it would be a waste of money.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Tell them, in the first place, that General Sherman is not an engineer, and in the next place that the greater portion of these forts he speaks of he never visited in his life.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I cannot tell them that, because I do not know it to be true. Besides, the people of the country have confidence in General Sherman. He is the head of the war establishment, and is naturally presumed to be familiar with the wants of that establishment.

The bill contains other paragraphs in reference to which a similar remark may be made. Here is an appropriation of $30,000 for Portsmouth Harbor. In reference to this, General Sherman, when asked whether it was necessary, said, "I think not." Now, how can I go home and defend a vote in favor of this appropriation of $30,000, when General Sherman, the head of the war establishment, says he does not think it necessary? So with regard to Boston Harbor, for which the bill proposes an appropriation of $40,000. General Sherman says it is unnecessary. Thus you can find in this bill appropriations amounting in the aggregate to $200,000 or $300,000, which expenditures the General of the Army says are not necessary.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Is not the gentleman mistaken in saying that the appropriation in this bill for Boston Harbor has been declared by General Sherman to be unnecessary? I do not so understand.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I read from page 23 of the testimony:

The CHAIRMAN. The aggregate amount asked for Boston Harbor is $315,000.

General SHERMAN. If you are flush of money and want to spend it you can do it on forts easily enough; but if you must economize, I should judge that now is a good time to begin on these fortification estimates.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The Committee on Appropriations have left out everything in regard to Boston Harbor except a single appropriation, which was not among those that General Sherman said were not needed.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I do not know as to that particular case, I do not care as to any particular case; but here in this bill are dozens of fortifications for which General Sherman says it would be a waste of money to continue the appropriations. Now, I would like my distinguished colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] to tell me how I can go home to my people, who are in favor of retrenchment, reform, and economy, and explain to them a vote in favor of appropriations amounting to two or three hundred thousand dollars for purposes for which General Sherman says it is a waste of money to make appropriations?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Chairman, the trouble is that gentlemen do not take the bill as it is. Instead of taking up and discussing the separate items as we reach them in order, gentlemen discuss all these points together. If they would confine their remarks to the particular item under consideration, a definite answer could be made.

But in regard to Boston Harbor, I wish to say that while the estimate was over $300,000, we have cut down the appropriation to $40,000. I do not understand General Sherman to say that the sums proposed to be appropriated in this bill (less than one-fifth of the estimates) are not needed. If he does say that, he does not give any reason for it, any more than in the case of Fort Hamilton and Fort Tompkins, in reference to which he is reported as saying on one page that no appropriation is necessary, and on the next page that they are the most important forts in the country, and that the engineers ought to have all they ask.

Now, as I understand, Mr. Chairman, we have reached, in the consideration of the bill, the appropriation for Fort Adams, Newport Harbor. If the other items have been passed I would like to give a reason for this. The water in that harbor is the deepest on our coast. This fortification commands the entrance of that harbor. Now, we do not propose to appropriate any great sum. Some gentleman has said, "These works are never finished." Why, sir, we make no appropriation this year for one-half of our forts. There are forts for which we have not appropriated for several years. But let me refer in detail to the case of this fortification at Newport Harbor. It is a protection to Fall River and Providence. During the last war Newport and New London were the rendezvous of our naval vessels. It is a place most important to be fortified, because it is the very place where, in case of war, all our commerce, amounting to millions of dollars, would go for protection. The Engineer Department recommend for this work a very moderate appropriation. For what purpose? Simply to change some works which require larger guns than we formerly used. If General Sherman's attention had been called to the fact that these inconsiderable appropriations have for their object to substitute, for guns which would not be worth firing off against a British man-of-war, guns that amount to something, and which require different platforms and masonry, he would readily see that the appropriations are necessary.

Now, my friend from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] is very peaceful. He anticipates the time when we shall not have any more war. In the early part of this discussion I referred to the fact that England has to-day about fifty of the strongest iron-armored ships that were ever built in the world. This does not look much as if we need tear down our fortifications. A British authority has said in reference to those war vessels that the most powerful of them was made with reference to crossing the Atlantic, entering our harbors, and laying our cities under contribution. Now, a peace platform would be a very poor protection against an iron-clad that could send a shot that would penetrate almost the thickest walls; and it would be very peaceful indeed for us to leave our fortifications without a single gun to respond to the attack of such a vessel. Now, if we are to do anything to protect our coast against this class of armored vessels with their heavy guns, we cannot do less than make such appropriations as are proposed in this bill.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew the amendment. I have heard my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] quoting to us the testimony of General Sherman; and having read that testimony, I must say that while I have a very high respect for General Sherman as a military officer, I think he makes about the poorest witness I have ever met. [Laughter.] I can quote General Sherman against General Sherman on every page. Let me give a specimen:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that it is advisable to go on with the rapid manufacture of small-arms?

General SHERMAN. No, sir; we can buy them from the private establishments faster than we can collect and equip men to use the arms.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. You cannot start making a new pattern of gun within six months' time in any of these factories, because they have first to go to work and make the tools, and the tests, and the gauges. But when they get the machinery in order they can turn out arms with great rapidity.

General SHERMAN. You ought to have on hand two hundred thousand of the best possible muskets at all times.

The CHAIRMAN. Would or would it not be necessary to have the machinery for making arms?

General SHERMAN. It would not, because that machinery may be superseded by new inventions. * * * * *

Then we have General HAWLEY again asking this question:

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. An arms-manufacturing establishment in my own town is now finishing a contract for the amount of $1,100,000, and is making machinery for the new Prussian rifle, because they can make better machinery here than in Prussia.

General SHERMAN. The Springfield armory is very fine, and should always be kept in full operation for account of the Government.

Now, I did not dare read this when I was urging more appropriation for the Springfield armory. I did not know on which side he was. [Laughter.] I might have read a part, but some other gentleman might have risen and read the other part. [Renewed laughter.] As I have stated, while I have the highest respect for his military abilities, yet when he talks about forts—never happening to be where there were any during his operations; he always had an open field and trusted to legs rather than to intrenchments [laughter]—I do not think his opinion should supersede that of trained engineer officers.

Mr. COBURN. Was he not at Vicksburgh and Atlanta?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; there were earthworks there. What he would have done if they were of stone I do not know.

I am glad to hear my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, say we ought to act as though there was possibility of war. That is what I wanted him to say the other day when we had up the appropriation for small-arms. Why did he not say that then?

Mr. GARFIELD. We gave you $100,000 for the Springfield armory.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But you did not give as General Sherman wanted you to, for then you would have appropriated sufficient to keep the Springfield armory in full operation. Have you done that? By no manner of means. On the contrary, I wish to say I have been at the Ordnance Bureau, and have been informed that on the 1st of July next they will have to discharge two hundred and fifty skilled workmen on your appropriation.

My opinion is worth little or much, as it may be; it would be a great deal better to put this appropriation into large, heavy guns, able to penetrate iron-clads, and trust for fortifications to what our soldiers can throw up in a few hours by the shovel. There is no work I have ever seen equal to an earthwork. There is hardly a fort you have got with reference to which I would not feel like saying with Farragut, when they put him into an iron-clad and the iron bolts began to rattle, "Let me get out on deck where I shall be safe." [Laughter.]

Mr. COBURN. Let me read from General Sherman on that point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would if I had time.

Mr. COBURN. It confirms what you say.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Which part are you going to read? [Laughter.]

Mr. COBURN. Let me read:

The CHAIRMAN. Would it not be better to expend money on heavy guns rather than on forts?

General SHERMAN. It would be far better for us to buy the best guns and carriages and store them at points convenient for transportation. The money would be far better spent in that way than in building forts which cannot be moved.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. We had proof of that when our iron-clads and monitors, with the heaviest guns, were compelled to withdraw disabled from their attack upon the brick work at Fort Sumter after two hours' contest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let me answer that. It was not until we had battered down Fort Sumter from a brick fortification into an earthwork, throwing the bricks down into a natural slope, thus making it impregnable—until we had thrown down that brick fortification when it was occupied by United States soldiers after two days' firing by raw recruits; I say it was not until after we had battered it down thoroughly and made an earthwork—and that was all it was—that it withstood all our fleet. You can throw up sea-sand in ten hours, with a good corps of engineers and workmen, and make a fortification which would last just as long. The trouble with Fort Sumter was it was built on ripraps in the water, where an earthwork would be impossible.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fort on Willet's Point, East River, New York, $30,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman having charge of this bill whether this work at Willet's Point is an established fort or a work now being constructed?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This is an important point. Everybody knows that that was the point most relied on when the Spanish vessels were expected to get to New York.

Mr. GARFIELD. The work has been going on for some time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reduce the appropriation to $5,000; and I desire to have read the views of General Sherman on this work.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fort at Willet's Point will be, in connection with Fort Schuyler, a very important work in the event of the Government succeeding in deepening the channel by Hell Gate to the extent of thirty feet. If that is done it will, in my judgment, reverse the foreign commerce of New York, and bring it all through Long Island Sound past Hell Gate to the East River, allowing such ships as the Great Eastern and the largest ships of the world to come through Long Island Sound. In that event the heavy iron-clad fleets of England could come through the sound, and we would have to have a fort at Willet's Point; but at present, and until that is done, I would not spend a cent on it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the statement made by General Sherman. He makes a very clear statement of the position of the fort at Willet's Point in connection with Fort Schuyler, and informs us that in the presence of the improvements of Hell Gate there is no necessity for spending a dollar on the fort at Willet's Point. I understand this to be an established fort, and suppose that some small sum may be necessary to be appropriated for the purpose of keeping the armaments of the fort in proper condition. I inquire of the gentleman having charge of the bill if that is necessary, and if so what sum is so required?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. If there is any one thing in the whole bill that the engineers before us thought was most important it was this very item. There cannot be anything more important. The argument of the gentleman from Indiana, so far as General Sherman's opinion is concerned, is predicated on an incorrect basis.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only desired to inquire of the gentleman from Connecticut whether an appropriation was necssary to keep up the armament of the fort, and if so what sum was necessary for the purpose.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. General Sherman goes on the hypothesis that none of these iron-clads can enter New York Harbor now. But three-fourths of them can; and the Engineer Department regard this as a matter of most vital importance.

Mr. HOLMAN. No doubt; where money is to be expended it is always a matter of vital importance. But what I want to know is whether it is necessary to appropriate a sum of money merely to look after the armaments; and if the gentleman is able to answer that inquiry I will be obliged by his doing so.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to say that this small amount is appropriated simply for the purpose of defending the entrance to New York Harbor through Long Island Sound. There has been a large amount of money expended for removing the rocks at Hell Gate; and when that work is complete that will be the channel for the commerce of the city of New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have here the report of the General of the Army. Here is a gentleman who is, above all others, interested in the work of national defense, and he tells us that in the present condition of this work he would not spend a dollar; and yet Congress is called upon to spend $30,000 in the very teeth of this report of the head of the Army.

Mr. WOODFORD. These forts guard the entrance to New York by way of Long Island Sound.

Mr. HOLMAN. Everybody knows that.

Mr. WOODFORD. From the tenor of the gentleman's remarks I had feared lest there might be members who dreamed that these forts lay among the prairies of Central Indiana, and not at the entrance to the great commercial metropolis of the nation. The channel of Hell Gate, as was stated by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] is being deepened and will very shortly be in a condition to admit the largest vessels. You spend thousands of dollars at points that are immaterial to the commerce of the country; and a paltry $50,000 to keep in repair and place in effective condition the works that guard this entrance to the harbor of New York, gentlemen, under the pretended plea of economy, attempt to resist. I trust to the discretion of this House to pay such heed to the commerce of New York as will give us the little money that is necessary to continue the work upon these fortifications during the current year.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. POTTER. I renew it for the purpose of saying that the approach to New York from the East through Long Island Sound carries the most water of any approach to New York till you get to very near the city; in fact, until you get within the city limits. The Great Eastern, when she came up a few years ago, in seeking to reach New York, was unable to go in by the ordinary entrance at Sandy Hook, but came by the Long Island Sound, getting within the present city limits as far as the foot of One hundred and fiftieth street, I think. The largest vessels can come in now past these works to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] referred, and can reach a point within the present city limits without being compelled to wait until the excavations to which he refers at Hell Gate can be finished.

Beyond that I can say that vessels drawing over twenty feet of water can pass Hell Gate in the present condition of the works, and of course when the works are completed, which will widen the channel, the heaviest vessels are expected to pass it. But the condition of the water at present is such that vessels of a most dangerous character could now actually come within the city limits but for these forts; and if any place ought to be defended one would suppose that a place of the magnitude of the city of New York ought to be. I repeat that vessels of a very destructive class can, in the present condition of the water at Hell Gate, come within the city limits of New York, and can only be kept out, in case of hostilities, by the fort at Willet's Point on the one side and Fort Schuyler on the other, where the sound narrows up to the East River. In short, no other fortification in the whole bill is more important to complete, nor indeed so important as this very fort at Willet's Point, to an appropriation for which the gentleman from Indiana objects.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I renew the amendment. I think gentlemen forget, in this discussion, that within a few years a great change has been effected in the ordnance desirable for our fortifications. The old heavy ordnance has already become obsolete; hence there is great necessity for new armaments for our forts. With the view of throwing some light on this subject, I desire to read a question submitted to General Humphreys on this subject, and his answer:

Question. What number of heavy guns, if any, do we need for the present works?
Answer. The number of additional positions and platforms which will be ready for heavy guns on the 30th June next, but for which, so far as I am informed, there are no guns, will be approximately as follows: About 266 for 15-inch and 13-inch smooth-bore or equivalent rifle guns; about 400 for 10-inch guns, and about 50 for mortars of the heaviest kind.

Respecting the necessity of providing more 10-inch guns, I have to remark that the plans for modifying the existing works and batteries, and for new works and batteries prepared since 1866, make no provision for heavy guns of less caliber than the 15-inch smooth-bore or equivalent rifle gun. Existing positions for smaller guns, which are not modified for the large guns, remain.

Now this is but a very small appropriation to meet the new demands that have arisen for the defense of the country. Gentlemen know that I was not much in sympathy with the idea of reducing the Army and opening our borders to the Indians. Hence I am not much in sympathy now with the striking down the appropriations for our coast defense. Some time ago there was a discussion as to whether our large cities were not open to the attacks of the naval armaments of foreign countries. On that subject General Humphreys, who is an engineer and a scientific man, says that nearly all our sea-coast towns are open to attack from the war ships of the enemy, and after referring to the Devastation and Monarch class of vessels, he says there are other classes of vessels which can enter a number of our ports; and he gives a list of the ports so exposed.

Now, every one of these places for which appropriations are asked, being in a condition which these vessels can enter, it seems to me that it would be manifestly unjust to withhold appropriations to put those places in some condition of defense, with the new armaments that are necessary for the present time.

The question recurred upon Mr. HOLMAN'S motion to strike out "30" and insert "5," so as to reduce the appropriation for the fort at Willet's Point, East River, New York, to $5,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say a word in reference to that amendment. The gentleman from Connecticut who has charge of the bill has not seen proper to inform the House or the country what is the necessity for this appropriation. I feel compelled to assume that some smaller sum is necessary; but if the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentlemen from New York expect the country to approve of appropriations of money which are made in defiance of the matured judgment of the General of the Army, when he recommends that not a cent shall be appropriated, I think they labor under a very great mistake. The country expects no money to be spent unnecessarily. New York City is entitled to the same consideration as any other portion of the United States, and no more. The position of General Sherman is that works of this character, as was shown during the war in the case of the forts at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and the forts at Vicksburgh which the confederates held for the purpose of commanding the navigation of the Mississippi River, practically amount to nothing, and that temporary works thrown up on the spur of the moment are more effective. Sir, it was also shown during the late war that that famous fort in the harbor of Charleston, Fort Sumter, a fortification constructed with brick, and stone, and marble, became valuable only when it was reduced to a mere earthwork. Now, sir, the General of the Army recommends that not one cent shall be appropriated for this fort at Willet's Point or for Fort Schuyler, and yet gentlemen with no experience in the Army or in matters of national defense, insist that this money shall be appropriated. Talk about economy, or the possibility of it, when, in the face of the officer who is responsible in these matters, gentlemen in this House insist that an appropriation like this be made!

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana that the sum reported in this bill is less that half what was reported many years before the war. The appropriations are cut down to a smaller figure than before the war.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, certainly; but General Sherman says that for these works not one cent should be appropriated. Who is to be the adviser of the Government?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The engineer who examined the works.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I hardly thought it necessary to say anything on this point; but it seems that the gentleman from Indiana really intends to press his amendment. I want to correct a misapprehension under which some gentlemen seem to labor, and that is, that the old-fashioned forts of brick and stone are worthless. That is a very great mistake; they can repulse the most powerful fleet.

There seems to be a mistake in the minds of gentlemen here about the work that Fort Sumter did. When Fort Sumter was first attacked by Du Pont's fleet—and I was in the subsequent siege operations, and I witnessed a large portion of them myself—it had not then been battered into the condition of an earthwork, to which reference has been made. It was then in its original condition, with perpendicular walls of stone and brick, and it did repulse the iron-clad fleet. These old-fashioned brick and stone works can do that again.

This is the trouble about them; if these heavy iron-clads can lie up against these brick or stone forts in spite of the torpedoes, they can in no long time knock the walls to pieces. Or if you can make regular approaches on land, planting your heavy modern siege-guns, you can in a little time knock these forts into the condition of Fort Sumter, resembling earthworks. In that condition they are also very powerful to resist an attack; for wherever you strike the slope with a heavy shot, the earth flies up into the air, and comes down, and settles into position at an angle of forty-five degrees, and it is as good as it was before. Our people, with their heavy guns on land at a mile's distance, so battered and breached Fort Pulaski in thirty-one hours' firing that it was compelled to surrender. But Fort Pulaski, when properly armed, was capable of keeping off for a long time almost any attack that could be brought to bear against it by ships of war.

Now, in regard to this appropriation for Willet's Point, I have no question that the engineers are right. We must take the word of somebody, and there is no word better for us to take than that of this board of competent and patriotic officers. They are the ablest men in the profession, and they are capable of giving you the best advice you can have. You must have the entrances to New York Harbor both well defended. As for this appropriation of $30,000, not one cent of it is for guns. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] seems to think that it might be appropriated for that purpose, and he spoke of $5,000 being sufficient. Why, sir, $5,000 would not buy one of these 20 or 15 inch guns. This appropriation is necessary to carry on the work which has been begun here. It is only one-half done. It is like a man with one leg in his trousers; and the question is whether he shall go and clothe himself or back out entirely. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] what this $30,000 is for?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It is for building the fort.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has already been stated that this work has been constructed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Not at all; it is in progress of construction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Gentlemen seem to think that we are entirely justified in putting our judgment and the judgment of engineers against the judgment of the head of the Army. Fort Schuyler is designed for the same purpose as this new fort at Willet's Point. We are told that not a dollar should be appropriated on this work. No gentleman will say that an officer of the capacity of General Sherman would lie to Congress on this subject, or that any person who feels the solicitude that distinguished officer and citizen must feel in national defenses, would give wrong information. No man of his capacity would wrong the Government in the matter of expenditure of public money upon subjects coming within the purview of his official duties.

General Sherman has told us that this appropriation should not be made; yet gentlemen claim that it should be made. It seems to me that it is but a barren result of our professions for economy, if we make appropriations of this kind. Here is a work not needed heretofore, a work only in process of construction, a work in connection with Fort Schuyler in the immediate vicinity. And yet in a time of profound peace this sum of money is to be appropriated for this unnecessary work.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that this is clearly a case of divided authority? The General of the Army gives one opinion in respect to this matter and certain other matters in this fortification bill, and in that respect he is at odds with the Engineer Department. Is it not a question between the two? Giving General Sherman all the credit due for his illustrious service, and giving the Engineer Bureau all the credit due to that Bureau, is it not a question about which men may be divided as to the weight of authority?

Mr. HOLMAN. I can see that. The gentlemen who have charge of the work are in favor of the appropriation, and the General of the Army resists it. And we are asked to throw the weight of our judgment in behalf of the expenditure of this money.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is not a question between General Sherman and local influences, but a question between General Sherman and the recommendation of the corps of the Army which has immediate charge of this matter; a corps which has no more to do with local influences than the gentleman himself.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman know that a single officer has charge of that work, and that upon his report alone the recommendation for this appropriation comes to us from the Engineer Corps?

It is the act of a single gentleman connected with the Army who has charge of that work; it is not the act of any board. These estimates are based upon the single recommendation of the engineer in charge; yet gentlemen here undertake to put his judgment against that of the General of the Army. In this hour of economy we are told that the presumption must be in behalf of a subordinate who recommends large appropriations rather than in behalf of his chief commanding officer who speaks in the interest of economy.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] would claim that the Engineer Bureau in the Army is a body of men that would be influenced by local pressure, or ever have been.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know that such is the case, and it is not material to the subject. The proposition here is to put the judgment of a single local engineer at Willet's Point and Fort Schuyler against that of the General of the Army.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is the recommendation of the whole Engineer Bureau.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman from Maine know that the reports which come to us from the Engineer Corps are founded entirely upon the judgment of the local engineers?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I want to say that General Humphreys and two or three of his best engineers have repeatedly examined this point personally, and they regard it as the most important defensive work around New York.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. They all agree in that opinion.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. And General Sherman himself concedes its importance.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I am quite familiar with the approaches to New York Harbor by way of Long Island Sound; and as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has stated that this fort has not been required until quite recently, I will say, for his information, that by way of Long Island Sound the largest men-of-war can come within such distance of New York City as to bring their guns within range of its rapidly extending population. In my opinion, no point around New York Harbor requires more attention than the entrance from Long Island Sound.

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. Chairman, every one who knows anything about this matter knows that this is one of the most important and necessary appropriations that can be made. It is designed for one of the most important of the approaches to New York, one which is destined, probably, to be the most important when the channel at Hell Gate shall have been deepened. The engineers, the men who know most about this matter, recommended an appropriation of $75,000; and that sum ought to be voted by this House. The Committee on Appropriations, however, have cut down the amount to $30,000; and now gentlemen here wish to reduce the appropriation to even lower figures, giving no more for this important defensive point than is proposed to be appropriated to places of comparatively no consequence. I cannot understand this attack on the city of New York. A blow against New York is a blow whose shock reaches the whole country. I do not see any reason why the House should accede to this demand.

There is no economy in cutting down this appropriation in the manner proposed. Here is a fort which is in process of completion, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] would stop the work upon it. It is a most important defensive work for the greatest commercial city of our country. In the present condition of the approaches to that city, formidable war vessels could come there and make their attack. This fort is indispensable to protect that passage. The statement made by my colleague [Mr. POTTER] on this subject is entirely correct. The work on this fort ought to be continued. The appropriation for it should be increased rather than diminished. The engineers, in recommending an appropriation of $75,000, knew what they were about. General Sherman, whose authority is appealed to, cannot be assumed to understand from cursory observation these naval approaches so well as these engineers, whose special business it is to report upon the condition and needs of this defense.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I regret to see that my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] for whom I have a great deal of respect, and whose economical principles are exercised upon all occasions upon this floor when the interests of his own immediate locality are not involved, should oppose these necessary appropriations for the defense of New York Harbor. As was remarked here the other day, the gentleman from Indiana is a very excellent "watch-dog of the Treasury," except when any of the family passes by, and at such times he forgets to bark. I wish he would exercise his musical voice—I will not say his bark—more consistently and impartially. I have too high a respect for the gentleman's integrity to question for a moment his motives. I admit that they are entirely honest; but I think he is often mistaken. In the present case he is laboring under a mistake which influences so many other gentlemen from his section when they come to legislate for matters connected with the great commercial interests of New York City. Of course he knows the value of that city to the country at large. He knows how vitally important it is that every part of the city of New York and its surroundings should be protected against the attacks of foreign foes; and he knows what a mere bagatelle the sum of $30,000 would be when applied to the work of protecting the city of New York in case of war.

The gentleman quotes the General of the Army to justify his opposition to this bill; but let me refer to the language of that officer:

> Fort Schuyler and the fort at Willet's Point would be important in the event of a channel being opened through Long Island Sound and through Hell Gate.

Now, there is already a channel through Long Island Sound. A few years ago the Great Eastern could find only one channel to approach the city of New York, and that was through Long Island Sound, the very place for which this appropriation is asked. And as to Hell Gate, we have for the last four or five years appropriated large sums of money to remove the obstructions at that point, so as to allow foreign commerce to approach the city of New York by a shorter route, thus saving a day's sailing even to steamers.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me suggest to my friend from New York that it also saves a very dangerous coast outside.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Certainly; and I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. The very fact that this fortification may be needed in the event of such a contingency, which we should not only anticipate as possible, but which we may expect to happen at an early day, is enough for this House to take action at once in putting this fortification, declared to be so indispensable, in the most perfect condition of defense. Whatever ill-considered remarks may have been made by the General of the Army on other questions, they have nothing to do with this appropriation. We have here the strongest testimony from General Sherman that he considers this fortification indispensably necessary for the proper defense of the harbor of New York in the contingency of a conflict with any foreign power. I hope the House, therefore, will not act in any unwise and unpatriotic manner, but will consider, in whatever action may be taken, the city of New York, as it is, as the great heart of this great nation.

Mr. ARCHER. The amendment is withdrawn, and I will renew it for the purpose of saying a few words.

Now, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the recommendation of General Sherman, or whatever may be the recommendation of the Corps of Engineers, we have a duty to perform here which overrides the recommendation of either, or both. I assert here as an incontrovertible fact, that the city of New York is in an indefensible condition against the iron-clads of foreign nations. I say no scientific man connected either with the Army or Navy of the United States will pretend to say the city of New York can be defended against these iron-clads, except in two ways. One way I should be ashamed to see the nation adopt, that is, by sinking vessels in the harbor to prevent the passage of iron-clads. The other is by depending upon torpedoes; and depending upon that, sir, is depending upon a most doubtful and uncertain defense. The torpedo system in this country is yet, I may say, in its infancy, and while it is in its infancy the defense against torpedoes has as fully advanced as the torpedo system itself.

The English people, the French, and the Spanish, are now providing defenses against torpedoes, by throwing out net-works and by various other means. And if, sir, we adhere to the reduction of the Navy, which was one means of defense, and which reduction has been made by this House, and we go still further, as proposed by this bill and by the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] reducing this appropriation, then the great metropolis of this country, which affects every part of the body-politic, will lie at the mercy of any power which may choose to attack us.

Sir, we are here to act, as I say, independently of the recommendation of the General of the Army, independently of the Corps of Engineers, and according to our own lights—lights which we derive from information of scientific men all over the world, to see that our country is properly defended against all comers.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope we will now have a vote.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think it is time for the committee to rise, as we are to have a night session for business.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendments will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope we will not rise now, but go on with the bill.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I hope the committee will not rise, but settle this question to-night.

The committee divided on the amendment; and there were—ayes 30, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STARKWEATHER and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 90.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SENER. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Let us go on until we have got beyond these items which have been under discussion.

Mr. SENER. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. COBURN. I move that the committee rise, and I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 43) authorizing a special court of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard.

And then, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, (at half-past four p. m.,) the House took a recess until half-past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

The Clerk will report the amendment which was pending when the House adjourned on last Thursday evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 460, in line 29, after the word "run," strike out these words, "which shall be distinctly stated," and insert in lieu thereof "and shall be invalid unless so limited;" so it will read:

Fifth. It shall have a fixed limited time to run, and shall be invalid unless so limited.

Mr. POLAND. This amendment was offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws, and has not yet been examined by them. And I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the committee will probably have some further amendments to propose in this chapter. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] who has had that chapter in charge has not been able to bring the amendments before the committee as yet. Therefore I propose to pass over this chapter this evening and take up another title, which has been under the charge of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BARBER.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the pending amendment will be passed over in accordance with the desire of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBER. I ask the attention of the House to title 32, "public lands," beginning on page 487. The first amendment I have to propose is to section 2213, on page 488.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2213. The surveyor-generals of Louisiana, Florida, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa, and of Dakota Territory, shall each receive a salary at the rate of $2,000 a year.

Mr. BARBER. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "Nebraska" strike out the comma,

Nebraska and Iowa are one district.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. The next amendment is to section 2231, on page 490.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2231. There shall be allowed for the offices of the several surveyor-generals, for clerk-hire therein, the following amounts for each year, namely: For the offices of surveyor-general of Louisiana and Florida, $2,500 each; for the offices of surveyor-general of Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska and Iowa, and of Dakota Territory, $6,300 each; for the offices of surveyor-general of Oregon, Nevada, New Mexico, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Utah, and Wyoming, $4,000 each; for the office of surveyor-general of California, $11,000; and for that of Arizona, $3,000.

Mr. BARBER. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "therein," in line 2, to the end of the section, and insert "such sums as may be appropriated for the purpose by Congress from year to year."

This is an ever-varying sum according to the business in the offices.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like my colleague to explain what the object of that amendment is.

Mr. BARBER. The section provides that there shall be allowed for the offices of the several surveyors-general, for clerk-hire therein, certain amounts named. That depends entirely on the appropriations and the amount of clerical work. And the amount of appropriations depends on the amount of work in the several districts.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like to know if the earnings of the clerks are to depend upon the amount appropriated by Congress, or if they are to have salaries at a fixed amount.

Mr. BARBER. There are no fixed salaries. Congress makes an appropriation for the particular office of so many thousand dollars for clerk-hire, varying the amount according to the necessities of the office for the year.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then unless Congress appropriates enough to pay the employés they are not paid at all?

Mr. BARBER. Of course not.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. There are two amendments the committee have agreed to which, coming up in this chapter of the land laws, it is thought should be inserted at an earlier point. The first is to add to section 451, on page 105, these words:

The chief clerk of the General Land Office shall perform the duties of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in case of a vacancy in said office, or of the absence or sickness of the Commissioner.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next amendment is to section 462, on page 107.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 462. It shall be the duty of the recorder of the General Land Office, in pursuance of instructions from the Commissioner, to certify and affix the seal of the office to all patents for public lands, and to attend to the correct engrossing, recording, and transmission of such patents. He shall prepare alphabetical indexes of the names of patentees and of persons entitled to patents; and he shall prepare such copies and exemplifications of matters on file or recorded in the General Land Office as the Commissioner may from time to time direct.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the section these words:

Whenever the office of recorder shall become vacant, or in case of his sickness or absence, the duties of his office shall be performed ad interim by the principal clerk of private land claims.

I will state that the revisers had supposed that the existing provisions of law were sufficiently covered by a general section, which provides for a principal clerk in Departments and Bureaus. But on examination it was found that the Land Office was not called either a department or a bureau in any statute, and it was thought better, therefore, that this provision should be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I desire to offer an amendment to section 2232, page 491.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2232. There shall be allowed for office-rent, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses of the several offices of surveyors-general the following amounts each year, namely: For the surveyor-general's office of Louisiana, Idaho, Wyoming, and Arizona, $2,500 each; for the surveyor-general's office of Dakota, Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico, Oregon, Washington, Nebraska and Iowa, and Montana, $2,000 each; for the surveyor-general's office of Florida, $1,500; for that of Minnesota, $2,200; for that of California, $7,000; for that of Nevada, $3,700; and for that of Utah, $1,800.

Mr. BARBER. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the whole of the section after the word "general," in the third line, and insert "such sums as may be appropriated for the purpose by Congress from year to year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. My next amendment is to section 2239, page 492, and is as follows:

Strike out the words "except for the Monroe land district in Louisiana," at the end of the section; so it will read:

SEC. 2239. There shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register of the land office and a receiver of public moneys for each land district established by law.

I am asked why this amendment is proposed. An act was passed authorizing the President to re-establish, or giving him discretionary power to re-establish, the Monroe land district in Louisiana, with the same boundaries that it formerly had. But there was no provision made in that act authorizing the President to appoint the officers. On inquiry at the Land Office I ascertained that the district had been re-established and officers appointed for it. Therefore I move to amend by striking out the words making the exception.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 3700, as follows:

SEC. 3700. The Treasurer of the United States, all assistant treasurers, and those performing the duties of assistant treasurer, all collectors of the customs, all surveyors of the customs, acting also as collectors, all receivers of public moneys at the several land offices, all postmasters, and all public officers of whatsoever character, are required to keep safely, without loaning, using, depositing in banks, or exchanging for other funds than as specially allowed by law, all the public money collected by them, or otherwise at any time placed in their possession and custody, till the same is ordered by the proper Department or officer of the Government to be transferred or paid out; and when such orders for transfer or payment are received, faithfully and promptly to make the same as directed, and to do and perform all other duties as fiscal agents of the Government which may be imposed by any law, or by any regulation of the Treasury Department made in conformity to law.

Mr. BARBER. I have an amendment which I propose to offer to section 2241, page 492. There is some doubt as to whether the amendment should come in at that place or immediately after section 3700; but as there is a defect there I offer it at this point and move it as an amendment to section 3700:

The President may, from time to time, if in his opinion the interests of the United States demand it, regulate and increase the sums for which bonds are required or may hereafter be required by law in the case of all officers from whom a bond may be demanded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. BARBER. Mr. Speaker, I have the amendment now drawn up in better phraseology by the chairman of the committee, and I will offer it instead of the amendment which has been read. I move to add to section 3700 the following:

The President is authorized, if in his opinion the interests of the United States require the same, to regulate and increase the sums for which bonds are or may be required by law, of all district attorneys, collectors of customs, naval officers, and surveyors of customs, navy agents, receivers and registers of public lands, paymasters in the Army, the Commissary-General, and all other officers employed in the disbursement of public moneys under the direction of the War or Navy Department.

Mr. POLAND. There is a general provision of law, a statute of considerable age, in the very words of this amendment which is offered to the chapter in relation to the public lands, because among those to whom it specifically applies are the registers and receivers of land offices; but if we put in an amendment merely making it apply to them, why, we should have to put the same thing in in a considerable number of other places. Therefore the committee decided to put it in another connection where it may be appropriate to all. The amendment which I have prepared, and which the gentleman has now offered, is a copy of the original statute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend section 2266, page 524, by inserting after the word "provisions," in line 4, the words "for a tract of land," and also by adding at the end of the section the words "for another tract;" so that it will read:

SEC. 2266. No person shall be entitled to more than one pre-emptive right by virtue of the provisions of section 2264; nor where a party has filed his declaration of intention to claim the benefits of such provisions for a tract of land, shall he file, at any future time, a second declaration for another tract.

That makes it conform literally to the statute and precludes any doubt as to its construction.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend on page 533 by inserting after section 2307 the following as a new section:

SEC. —. All public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida shall be disposed of in no other manner than according to the terms and stipulations contained in the preceding provisions of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. On page 538, section 2328, I move to strike out in line 17 the word "on," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "by;" so that it will read:

SEC. 2328. The miners of each mining district may make regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States, or with the laws of the State or Territory in which the district is situated, governing the location, manner of recording, amount of work necessary to hold possession of a mining claim, subject to the following requirements: The location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced. All records of mining claims hereafter made shall contain the name or names of the locators, the date of the location, and such a description of the claim or claims located by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify the claim. On each claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year. On all claims located prior to the 10th day of May, 1872, ten dollars' worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made by the 10th day of June, 1874, and each year thereafter, for each one hundred feet in length along the vein until a patent has been issued therefor; but where such claims are held in common, such expenditure may be made upon any one claim; and upon a failure to comply with these conditions, the claim or mine upon which such failure occurred shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made, provided that the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, have not resumed work upon the claim after failure and before such location. Upon the failure of any one of several co-owners to contribute his proportion of the expenditures required hereby, the co-owners who have performed the labor or made the improvements, may, at the expiration of the year, give such delinquent co-owner personal notice in writing or notice by publication in the newspaper published nearest the claim, for at least once a week for ninety days, and if at the expiration of ninety days after such notice in writing or by publication such delinquent should fail or refuse to contribute his proportion of the expenditure required by this section, his interest in the claim shall become the property of his co-owners who have made the required expenditures.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I have an amendment to offer to section 2349.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2349. The provisions of the preceding sections of this chapter shall not apply to the mineral lands situated in the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, which are declared free and open to exploration and purchase, according to legal subdivisions, in like manner as before the 10th day of May, 1872. And any bona fide entries of such lands within the States named, since the 10th day of May, 1872, may be patented without reference to any of the foregoing provisions of this chapter.

Mr. BARBER. I move to add to the section the following:

Such lands shall be offered for public sale in the same manner, at the same minimum price, and under the same right of pre-emption as other public lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to strike out sections 2350 and 2351.

The sections referred to were as follows:

SEC. 2350. The mineral lands in what were formerly known as the Lake Superior district in Michigan and the Chippewa district in Wisconsin shall be offered for public sale in the same manner, at the same minimum price, and under the same rights of pre-emption as the other public lands; but the right given by acts of Congress, approved respectively March 1 and 3, 1847, to certain lessees, occupants, and permittees to enter to the extent of their leases and permits, and no less, shall not be impaired by this section; but such lessees, occupants, and permittees are authorized to enter the land covered by their several leases, occupancy, and permits, as provided in the above-named acts, at the minimum price fixed by the following section.

SEC. 2351. The holder of a lease or permit covering more than one full section of such mineral lands shall be entitled, on the surrender and annulment of such lease or permit at the proper land office, to purchase, if he elects to do so, one full section, and no more, of the land covered by such lease or permit, at a minimum price of $2.50 per acre.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. On page 546, section 2356, line 9, strike out the word "two," and insert in lieu thereof the word "three;" so that it will read:

SEC. 2356. The three preceding sections shall be held to authorize only one entry by the same person or association of persons; and no association of persons any member of which shall have taken the benefit of such sections, either as an individual or as a member of any other association, shall enter or hold any other lands under the provisions thereof; and no member of any association which shall have taken the benefit of such sections shall enter or hold any other lands under their provisions; and all persons claiming under section 2354 shall be required to prove their respective rights and pay for the lands filed upon within one year from the time prescribed for filing their respective claims; and upon failure to file the proper notice, or to pay for the land within the required period, the same shall be subject to entry by any other qualified applicant.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. On page 546, section 2357, I move to insert, in line 1, after the word "upon," the word "coal;" and in the same section I move to strike out the word "hereafter," in the second line, and to insert "after the 3d day of March, 1873;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2357. In case of conflicting claims upon coal lands where the improvements shall be after the 3d day of March, 1873, commenced, priority of possession, and improvement, followed by proper filing and continued good faith, shall determine the preference-right to purchase. And also where improvements have already been made prior to the 3d day of March, 1873, division of the land claimed may be made by legal subdivisions, to include, as near as may be, the valuable improvements of the respective parties.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend the same section by adding at the end thereof the following:

The Commissioner of the General Land Office is authorized to issue all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this and the four preceding sections.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. On page 557, section 2401, I move to strike out, in line 19, the words "east and west," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "west and east."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend section 2403, so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 2403. In every case of the division of a quarter-section the lines for the division thereof shall run north and south, and the corners and contents of half-sections which may thereafter be sold shall be ascertained in the manner and on the principles directed and prescribed by the section preceding, and fractional sections containing one hundred and sixty acres or upwards shall in like manner, as nearly as practicable, be subdivided into half quarter-sections under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. And in every case of a division of a half quarter-section, the line for the division thereof shall run east and west, and the corners and contents of quarter quarter-sections, which may thereafter be sold, shall be ascertained as nearly as may be, in the manner, and on the principles, directed and prescribed by the section preceding; and fractional sections containing fewer or more than one hundred and sixty acres shall in like manner, as nearly as may be practicable, be subdivided into quarter quarter-sections, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

That provides for the division of the quarter-sections and fractional sections, while the section printed in this bill provides for the division of eighty-acre tracts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to strike out section 2410, on page 5509, which is as follows:

SEC. 2410. There shall be allowed, for surveying the public lands in the several States and Territories, the following rates, respectively, to wit:

For surveying the public lands in Louisiana, at rates not exceeding ten dollars per linear mile for township, and eight dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Florida, at rates not exceeding ten dollars per linear mile for standard, seven dollars for township, and six dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Minnesota, at rates not exceeding fourteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twenty dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Dakota Territory, at rates not exceeding ten dollars per linear mile for standard lines, seven dollars for township, and six dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Montana Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Nebraska, at rates not exceeding twelve dollars per linear mile for standard lines, nine dollars for township, and six dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Kansas, at rates not exceeding ten dollars per linear mile for standard lines, seven dollars for township, and six dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Colorado Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Idaho Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in New Mexico Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Arizona Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in California, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, fourteen dollars for township, and twelve dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Oregon, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, fourteen dollars for township, and twelve dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Oregon, situated west of the Cascade Mountains, densely covered with forests of thick undergrowth, at rates not exceeding sixteen dollars per linear mile for township and section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Washington Territory, at a rate not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, fourteen dollars for township, and twelve dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Utah Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Nevada, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines.

For surveying the public lands in Wyoming Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend section 2414 by striking out the words "are extended," and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall extend;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2414. The public surveys shall extend over all mineral lands; and all subdividing of surveyed lands into lots less than one hundred and sixty acres may be done by county and local surveyors at the expense of claimants; but nothing in this section contained shall require the survey of waste or useless lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. On page 573, section 2466, in line 1, I move to strike out the word "the" before "surveyors," and in line 2 to insert, after the word "shall," the words "perform the duties prescribed in the preceding section, and;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2466. The President is authorized to appoint surveyors of public lands, who shall perform the duties prescribed in the preceding section, and report to him the tracts by them selected, with the boundaries ascertained and accurately designated by actual survey or water-courses; and the tracts of land thus selected with the approbation of the President shall be reserved, unless otherwise directed by law, from any future sale of the public lands, and be appropriated to the sole purpose of supplying timber for the Navy of the United States; but nothing in this section contained shall be construed to prejudice the prior rights of any person claiming lands, which may be reserved in the manner herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. On page 578, section 2483, I move to insert after the word "streams," in line 3, the words "not navigable," so that the section will read:

SEC. 2483. All navigable rivers within the territory occupied by the public lands shall remain and be deemed public highways; and, in all cases where the opposite banks of any streams not navigable belong to different persons, the stream and the bed thereof shall become common to both.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. The chapters of the laws in relation to swamp lands were not inserted by the commission of revision or by the committee that revised that work. I have prepared sections that, I believe, contain all the laws relating to the grant of swamp lands; and I offer it, and move that it be added at the end of the chapter on public lands.

Mr. POLAND. I ought to state perhaps, in reference to this subject, that the commissioners, as I learned from some conversation with them, purposely left out all that is contained in the statutes in relation to swamp lands, because they decided that they did not come within that definition of the statutes that they were directed by the original act to revise; that is, that they were not of such a general and public character that it was necessary that they should be revised and placed in the new revision of the national statutes. But the committee in the examination of the laws came to a different conclusion. They believe that there is a considerable quantity of these swamp lands in a large number of States, and there are provisions of law some of which are common to all the States, and others peculiar to single States; and the committee came to the conclusion that it was important and proper that those laws should be embodied in the national statutes and in this chapter on public lands. They have therefore assumed the duties of revisers, and have revised the laws in relation to swamp lands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to have these sections read at length?

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the reading be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I will say that these sections have been reviewed at the Land Office carefully and thoroughly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And have the approval of the Land Office?

Mr. BARBER. And have the approval of the Land Office.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There is no new legislation in this matter?

Mr. BARBER. Not a particle.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I am now through with that portion of the bill upon which I am prepared to report. The chapter upon bounty lands is not yet perfected and ready to be offered. There are a large number of amendments to be made to it.

Mr. POLAND. I ask the Clerk to turn to page 1283, the chapter on bankruptcy, and in paragraph 8, section 5089, line 46, I move to strike out the word "or," after the word "intended," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "and," so that the section will read:

Eighth. Who, being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment, or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper, within a period of fourteen days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and to have become liable to be adjudged a bankrupt. And if such person shall be adjudged a bankrupt, the assignee may recover back the money or other property so paid, conveyed, sold, assigned, or transferred contrary to this title, provided the person receiving such payment or conveyance had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on this title was intended, and that the debtor was insolvent, and such creditor shall not be allowed to prove his debt in bankruptcy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BARBER] to state that he had to pause in his work, because he was not ready to report further. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] now turns the attention of the House to the chapter on bankruptcy. I would ask him whether it is the intention of the committee to ingraft into this new code the legislation of the present session?

Mr. POLAND. Not at all.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is not?

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman will read the title of our bill he will see that it is a bill to revise and consolidate the laws in force on the 1st of December, 1873.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In view of the legislation likely to be had on the subject of the bankrupt law, I suggest to the gentleman and to the House if it would not be better to incorporate the legislation of this session into the code?

Mr. POLAND. It would be utterly impossible.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Utterly impossible?

Mr. POLAND. We intend, as we have declared over and over again, that this shall be a revision of the laws that were in force when this Congress came together; and it is utterly impossible that the current and daily legislation should be included in the work.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I think that question ought to be considered in a fuller House than we have to-night——

Mr. POLAND. It has been considered over and over again.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I therefore move that the House adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. I trust my friend will not do that, but let us go on with our work.

Mr. O'NEILL. There are a large number of earnest men here to-night, who, I think, desire to go on and complete this work; who, I believe, have devoted their time to it, and have come here under a sense of duty to attend to the business of the people. I trust the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. POLAND. I trust my friend will withdraw his motion. If he knew the labor and embarrassment that the committee have had he would not press it.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. Section 5144 is a section that relates to the manner of proving debts against bankrupt estates.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 5144. Proof of debts may be taken in any district before any register or any commissioner of the circuit court authorized to administer oaths, but proofs taken by a commissioner shall be subject to revision by the register and by the court. If the creditor is in a foreign country, the proof of his debt may be taken before any minister, consul, or vice-consul of the United States.

Mr. POLAND. The committee are of opinion that the section as here given does not state with precise accuracy the present law in relation to proving debts, and they have therefore drawn a section which they move to substitute for this one.

The substitute was as follows:

Creditors residing within the judicial district where the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending shall prove their debts before one of the registers of the court, or before a commissioner of the circuit court within the said district. Creditors residing without the district, and within the United States, may prove their debts before a register in bankruptcy or a commissioner of the circuit court in the judicial district where such creditor, or either one of such joint creditors resides; but proof taken before a commissioner shall be subject to revision by the register and by the court.

The substitute was adopted.

Mr. POLAND. Section 5198 should be amended by striking out the word "presumptive," and inserting "prima facie."

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 5198. The fact that such a payment, pledge, sale, assignment, transfer, conveyance, or other disposition of a debtor's property as is described in the two preceding sections, is not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor, shall be presumptive evidence of fraud.

Mr. POLAND. The term used in the statute is "prima facie," and the committee think that in this connection the word "presumptive" has not the same legal significance as the term "prima facie."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I have an amendment to move to section 5338.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 5338. Whenever there is a treaty or convention for extradition between the Government of the United States and any foreign government, any justice of the Supreme Court, circuit judge, district judge, circuit-court commissioner, or judge of a court of record of general jurisdiction of any State, may, upon complaint made under oath, charging any person found within the limits of any State, District, or Territory, with having committed within the jurisdiction of any such foreign government any of the crimes provided for by such treaty or convention, issue his warrant for the apprehension of the person so charged, that he may be brought before such justice, judge, or commissioner, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered. If, on such hearing, he deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention, he shall certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony taken before him, to the Secretary of State, that a warrant may issue upon the requisition of the proper authorities of such foreign government, for the surrender of such person, according to the stipulations of the treaty or convention; and he shall issue his warrant for the commitment of the person so charged to the proper jail, there to remain until such surrender shall be made.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out in the first part of the section the words "circuit-court," before the word "commissioner," and to insert after the word "commissioner" the words "authorized so to do by any of the courts of the United States." The revisers had provided that proceedings in extradition might be had before these various judges that are named, both Federal and State, and also before any circuit-court commissioner. But the extradition acts provide that such proceedings may be had before either of these judges, or before "a commissioner authorized so to do by any of the courts of the United States." And in some extradition cases that have been determined, it has been held that a commissioner could not act unless he had a special authority so to do; that an ordinary court commissioner had not proper jurisdiction to hold proceedings in extradition cases. This amendment restores the precise language of our laws upon the subject of extradition.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next part which comes under my charge is the portion entitled "foreign relations." The first amendment which I shall offer is in section 4132.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 4132. After any such proclamation has been made, the several courts of the United States, and of each State, having criminal jurisdiction, and the several justices and judges of the courts of the United States, are authorized, and it shall be their duty, upon complaint against any alien enemy resident and at large within such jurisdiction or district, to the danger of the public peace or safety, and contrary to the tenor or intent of such proclamation, or other regulations which the President may have established, to cause such alien to be duly apprehended and conveyed before such court, judge, or justice; and after a full examination and hearing on such complaint, and sufficient cause appearing, to order such alien to be removed out of the territory of the United States, or to give sureties for his good behavior, or to be otherwise restrained, conformably to the proclamation or regulations established as aforesaid, and to imprison or otherwise secure such alien, until the order which may be so made shall be performed.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by striking out the words "and of each State," near the beginning of the section. I ought to make a statement to the House upon that amendment, because the section as reported by the revisers is exactly the law as it now stands on the statute-book.

This section is the original alien act of 1798, and at the time it was passed Congress apparently had not considered the power of the United States to confer jurisdiction upon State courts. Since that statute was passed the Supreme Court of the United States has held again and again that there is no constitutional power in Congress to confer any such authority upon a State court. The committee were therefore of opinion that as this portion of the act of 1798 does not conform to the Constitution, it could not be considered as a valid part of the existing law, and that the words indicated should be stricken out. It would be impossible for Congress to confer a criminal jurisdiction upon a State court, by which they could punish a violation of a law of Congress and give process to a United States marshal to execute their sentence, which this statute as enacted provides.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that question has never been determined judicially in reference to this particular act.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The question was decided, and that doctrine held, in the celebrated case of Prigg vs. State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; but it was not raised upon this particular statute.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me, therefore, that unless the particular act—not merely the principle but the particular act itself—has been judicially held to be invalid, the safest course would be to incorporate it into this compilation; otherwise the question might spring up as to whether the act is operative, and there might be a difference of opinion on that point.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] which I think is entitled to great consideration, I will state that the committee were unanimously of opinion that no such authority had been exercised for seventy years; that the statute was in this sense obsolete; that no similar power had been executed under the authority of the United States; that by the common consent and understanding of the people of the country, as well as by the judicial decision of the principle expressly governing the case, there is no longer existing any law conferring upon the State courts such an authority, and that to include the statute in a revision of the laws might possibly mislead some State court. I suppose that neither the gentleman from Indiana nor any other gentleman in this House would rise here and say that it could for a moment be supposed at the present time by any lawyer in the country that Congress can confer upon a State court the power to try an offense created only by a law of the United States, declare sentence for such an offense, and have the sentence executed by the United States marshal. The obvious constitutional objection to such a proceeding is that the judicial power, the power to try and punish offenses, must be exercised by the judicial power of the United States; that the judges of the United States must be appointed by the President, and confirmed by the Senate; and that the delegation of that power to any State tribunal cannot constitutionally take place.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not presume that there was any diversity of opinion upon the question of the constitutionality of this enactment. I take it for granted that for at least the last twenty years nothing has been better settled than that this statute is inoperative. But the point of my suggestion was, that if the committee should omit a provision like this on the ground of absence of constitutional authority in Congress, it might raise the suggestion that some other provision, whose constitutionality was not equally clear, might have been omitted on the same ground. If the act in question had been passed upon by the Federal courts, especially by the Supreme Court of the United States, I cannot see that any trouble could possibly arise; but where merely the principle in question has been decided upon, without any adjudication upon the specific act, the case might be different. Of course I do not object to the action of the committee in this case; I simply desired to call attention to the point.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. We have not taken such action as this in any case, and certainly would not do it without calling the attention of the House to the matter, and putting our action upon the record; and if in this case there were any difference of opinion upon the question, I should agree with my friend from Indiana that the language ought to stand. As there is no difference of opinion, we have the judgment of the House upon the direct question presented that the act is not a part of the existing law, and was inserted by inadvertence, in disregard of the Constitution.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree with the gentleman from Indiana, that the committee, upon any view of their own as to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a law, ought not either to put it in or leave it out. But the real question as to whether this is a constitutional law or not was very long ago decided by the Supreme Court of the United States; and, more than that, the decision has been so fully acquiesced in for a great number of years, the whole sentiment of the legal profession throughout the country has become so entirely clear and settled upon this subject that the committee were of opinion that to leave this provision standing to reappear in the laws, to re-enact it as the law, might be productive of some harm; that if it should thus be again brought forward, and apparently re-enacted, laymen throughout the country might suppose it to be in force, and consequently some difficulty might arise. Therefore, we not only thought ourselves justified in treating it as not law, but, as a matter of prudence and discretion, we deemed it altogether best to leave it out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No objection being made the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next section to which we desire to offer an amendment is section 4144.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4144. If, on such examination, it is made to appear that the person so arrested is a citizen of the United States, he shall be forthwith discharged from arrest, and shall be left to the ordinary course of law. But if this is not made to appear, and such court, judge, or commissioner finds, upon the papers hereinbefore referred to, a sufficient prima facie case that the matter concerns only the internal order and discipline of such foreign vessel, or, whether in its nature civil or criminal, does not affect directly the execution of the laws of the United States, or the rights and duties of any citizen of the United States, he shall forthwith, by his warrant, commit such person to prison, where prisoners under sentence of a court of the United States may be lawfully committed, or, in his discretion, to the master or chief officer of such foreign vessel, to be subject to the lawful orders, control, and discipline of such master or chief officer, and to the jurisdiction of the consular or commercial authority of the nation to which such vessel belongs, to the exclusion of any authority or jurisdiction in the premises of the United States, or any State thereof. No person shall be detained more than two months after his arrest, but at the end of that time shall be set at liberty, and shall not again be arrested for the same cause. The expenses of the arrest and the detention of the person so arrested shall be paid by the consul-general, consuls, or vice-consuls.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by striking out at the end of the section the words "consul-general, consuls, or vice-consuls," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "consular officers making the application."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have an amendment to offer to section 4192.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4192. The provisions of this title, relating to the jurisdiction of consular and diplomatic officers over civil and criminal cases, shall extend to any country of like character with which the United States may hereafter enter into treaty relations.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by inserting after the words "criminal cases," the words "in the counties therein named."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, (after a pause, during which Mr. POLAND and Mr. E. R. HOAR were conferring.) Mr. Speaker, is there no further business for us to consider this evening? I do not want this proceeding to cease. It is so pleasant and agreeable to be here and to listen to the discussion of these questions by these eminent gentlemen, that I dislike to see the proceedings interrupted or arrested. [Laughter.]

Mr. POLAND. I believe, Mr. Speaker, we are not prepared to entertain the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] any longer to-night.

Mr. O'NEILL. Well, I am truly sorry for that. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentlemen who absent themselves from these evening sessions, which are devoted to the revision of the laws, lose much more than they are aware of. I must confess my great regret that at one or two of the first night sessions devoted to this business I was unable to be present; but for the last few nights I have attended regularly, and I hope to be able to continue to do so until the whole revision shall be completed. I speak with great sincerity on this subject, and I hope that those who may look into the RECORD to-morrow will notice that the attention of members has been called to the fact that by failing to attend these evening sessions they are missing a great deal, and that, if they will come here and listen, they will learn, perhaps, more than at ordinary sessions of the House. I say this in justice to the gentlemen of the committee who are engaged in this labor of revising the laws.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eight o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 12, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM KANSAS.

Mr. INGALLS presented the credentials of Hon. JAMES M. HARVEY, chosen by the Legislature of Kansas Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Alexander Caldwell.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. HARVEY, he took his seat in the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FENTON presented a memorial of several hat manufacturers of Buffalo, New York, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of late soldiers in the war of the rebellion, citizens of Ohio, praying an equalization of bounty and bounty lands; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PATTERSON. I present resolutions of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, praying for the passage of the civil-rights bill now before Congress; and I desire to state in regard to these resolutions that on a call of the yeas and nays on their passage, they were voted for by every member of the Legislature except one, the democrats voting with the republicans for their passage. We have in South Carolina a civil-rights bill, and the people are entirely satisfied with it. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHURZ presented a petition of soldiers of the late war, citizens of Missouri, praying for a grant of one hundred and sixty acres of land and for an equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NORWOOD presented a resolution of the Legislature of Georgia in favor of granting pensions to surviving soldiers and the heirs of soldiers of the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER presented the memorial of Charles G. Barkley, asking for relief as surety on the bond of Dudley Walker, formerly a purser in the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of John R. Polke, of Wabash County, Indiana, praying for a special act giving him the pay and allowances of a major of infantry from the 22d day of May, 1864, to the 26th day of November, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the petition of members of the class of 1869 of the United States Naval Academy, praying that an act be passed allowing them to take rank and precedence as determined by the date of their graduation. This is a printed petition, and the names are printed, and I make it a rule not to present such petitions; but this comes with a manuscript letter of one of the signers to it, which I attach to the petition as his petition. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On the 27th of January an order was entered for the withdrawal of certain papers in the case of Wolf & Spink. By request, I now move that they be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of John B. McIntosh, administrator of John McIntosh, praying compensation for services rendered by said John McIntosh as lieutenant-colonel in the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. GORDON. I present a memorial from a committee appointed by a resolution of the city council of the city of Brunswick, Georgia, giving certain facts tending to show the importance of the establishment of a navy-yard by the Government at that port. I simply want to call special attention to the fact that there is no naval depot south of Norfolk, and that recent events and the prospect of a war on our immediate Southern Atlantic coast invest this subject with new interest. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a petition, signed by E. C. Curtiss, Belva A. Lockwood, and Hattie J. French, asking permission to make an excavation of twenty feet or more in depth on Goat Island, in San Francisco Bay, for the purpose of making some mineralogical and geological investigations, and to remove therefrom some minerals supposed to be there deposited, of which they possess a description; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS IN OREGON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the resolution offered by me the day before yesterday, and not acted upon yesterday by reason of the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to make an appeal to the Senator from Delaware. Yesterday I gave notice that after the expiration of the morning hour to-day I desired to submit some observations on a resolution that I offered early in the session, and it has been suggested to me by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that perhaps I had better proceed now.

Mr. BAYARD. I remember that the Senator from Oregon expressed a desire to address the Senate this morning, and I therefore withdraw my motion for the purpose of enabling him to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware withdraws his motion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I now call for the reading of the resolution on the table, submitted by me on the 3d of December.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for an act, as follows:

"A bill to provide for ascertaining losses sustained by citizens of Oregon by reason of Indian depredations.

"Whereas it is the duty of the Government to protect its citizens on the frontier, engaged in peaceful and honorable avocations, in the enjoyment of life and property against the depredations of hostile Indians, and whenever, for any reason, this protection is not given, it follows as a necessary consequence that it is a duty of equal magnitude resting on the Government to make good, so far as possible, the ascertained losses resulting from such failure; and whereas during several years past numerous depredations have been committed in the State of Oregon by wandering bands of Indians, principally Modocs and Snakes, who have in times of peace invaded the settlements and usual and known lines of travel, murdered the inhabitants, destroyed and carried away the property of citizens of said State, broken up their families, and caused those not massacred to flee from their homes for safety: Therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint three persons to act as commissioners, to inquire into the extent and character of said depredations, by what tribe or bands or portion of tribe or bands of Indians committed, when committed, the number and names of persons murdered, and the number and names of survivors of the families of such persons, the character and value of the property destroyed or carried away, from what portion of said State and to whom the same belonged, and the damages sustained by citizens of said State by reason of such depredations.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of said commissioners, or a majority of them, as soon as practicable, to proceed to the frontiers of said State, and take testimony under oath of such witnesses as may appear before them of all such depredations, when, where, by what band, bands, or portion of band, and upon and against whom committed, and as to the value of property destroyed, and when, and the damage sustained by each citizen by reason of such depredations, and shall make up and transmit to the Secretary of the Interior, as soon as practicable, their report, showing the result of such investigations, to which shall be appended all the testimony taken by them: Provided, Such commissioners, before proceeding to hear such testimony, shall give notice of the time and place of their meeting by publication thereof for ten days previous in at least two newspapers of said State: Provided further, That said commissioners shall, before entering upon such investigation, each take an oath to faithfully perform the duties of his office.

"SEC. 3. That said commissioners shall be entitled to and shall receive, as compensation for their services, the sum of ten dollars per day each and their traveling and other necessary expenses"—

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I desire, however, at this time, with the indulgence of the Senate, to submit some observations for the consideration of that committee.

On the 14th day of April last a scene was enacted near the boundary line that separates Oregon and California which startled the people of this Republic and caused many hearts to weep. It was the atrocity by which that good and noble man and valiant soldier, General E. R. S. Canby, and his associate, Rev. Dr. Thomas, were ruthlessly assassinated by the treacherous Modocs, while engaged in a peace conference under a flag of truce.

Such an act of barbaric savagery may well call forth public indignation and the universal condemnation of mankind. Subsequent events demonstrated that it did not require the commission of any similar act to induce a general sentiment calling for a war of extermination, if need be, against those who were guilty of this act of barbarism. And yet this high-handed outrage against humanity, this bloody assault, operating as it did against the laws of life and of civilization as well, is but one of a series of acts of treachery and assassination upon the part of certain bands and tribes of Indians in Oregon that have, from the earliest settlement of its territory until now, stained our frontiers with the life-blood of our citizens, kept our pioneers in constant alarm, and, to a great extent, held in abeyance the settlement of our country.

The only difference in the character of these acts is this: in the case just alluded to the victims were men whose reputation was a national treasure; by their death the whole country was startled; and as the people mourned their tragic fate they vowed vengeance swift and terrible upon the perpetrators of this great crime, while in the many other cases the victims were the obscure and unprotected, but no less noble men and women whose proud vocation it is to brave the dangers of frontier life and to build up with patient, tireless hands and patriotic hearts the empire of civilization amid the forests and on the plains of the distant West.

And although where Canby fell, a martyr as I believe, to a mistaken policy at the time, and one which his own better judgment repudiated, and the scene enacted there will ever be accorded a mention and place in history as an enduring evidence of the natural perfidy of disposition so peculiar to Indian character, this is but one of many scores of unprovoked and diabolical assassinations of our citizens that to-day from our distant State appeal in garments of blood to a just Government for restitution.

I take it that the relation which has existed between the United States and the various Indian tribes for the past quarter of a century should imply a guarantee upon the part of the Government to protect the citizen at his home, engaged in peaceful pursuits or passing over the common lines of travel, against Indian depredations. This, I take it, is true in a purely legal sense, and it unquestionably is true in an equitable and moral sense. Failure to provide this protection necessarily results in imposing upon the Government an obligation to make pecuniary restitution, so far as possible, for damages resulting from such failure.

To those whose lot is cast amid the peaceful scenes of eastern life, where civilization reigns in all its beauty and beneficence, free from those trials and conflicts, and those bitter experiences, that invariably attend the life of a pioneer, it is somewhat difficult, I doubt not, to apprehend and to appreciate the justice of the complaints of those who have taken their lives in their hands, pushed through the wilderness, and established the blessings of civilization on the remotest borders of our continent. Complaints, Mr. President, that in these later days are too frequently met by a strange and unjust sentimentality from the Government which seems to beseech a sympathy in all cases for the Indian, and at the same time to impute a wrong to the white man.

After a residence of many years in the far West, during which time I have been a careful observer of the dealings of the Government with the Indian tribes, I am constrained to believe that all this outcry to the effect that the Indians have been the victims of persecution, either on the part of the Government or its citizens, and that Indian depredations are to be attributed to this cause, is, as a rule, founded on a gross misconception of the real facts in the case, aided, perhaps it may be, by a willful perversion of those facts in not a few instances. The millions of dollars annually expended, and the efforts put forth individually and by the Government in promoting the welfare of these people, by elevating them from their unfortunate condition by nature—that of barbarians—to such a state of civilization as their race may be susceptible of attaining, is a sufficient answer to all this senseless clamor. The highest demands of justice in this enlightened age have been fully met, as a rule, upon the part of the Government and its citizens in dealing and in treating with the Indian race.

And in what I here say I shall not vary a hair's breadth from that elevated and enlightened spirit of the age, so humane in its elements, and which declares that equal and exact justice to all human kind is the rule by which the action of both government and individuals should be regulated. But it is by virtue of, and in the name of, this very element of our political, and, I might say, personal faith, that I would demand a hearing to-day from the Government in behalf of the white settlers upon our frontiers, who have suffered at the hands of Indian marauders. I would not assail any policy of the Government, whether it be called the peace policy, the Quaker policy, or the pow-wow policy, provided always that in the administration of that policy the life, liberty, and property of the white settler are protected from violence, and at the same time exact justice done to the Indian. But, sir, if in the administration of any policy the sacred rights of those are to be held in jeopardy who volunteer to prepare in the wilderness places for the seats of civilization and highways for the car of progress, who widen the field of commercial and scientific advancement and of national development, and to a very great extent, in the State of Oregon, I assert that these rights have been invaded, then I condemn such a policy.

And am I wrong in declaring there is great danger that our Indian commissions and peace advocates, selected as they are with reference to their religious associations and belief, almost universally, without ever having lived upon a frontier and with little or no knowledge of the Indian character—I repeat, is there not great danger that men thus chosen, however good and honest they may be, will be prone so to sympathize and side with the Indian race to such an extent as to be unable to do justice to the white race? Is there not danger that men thus chosen will be so desirous of elevating the Indian as to forget for the time being the rights of the white man?

How often in these later years do we hear the assertion that all the outrages perpetrated by savages on our western borders are superinduced by the wrongs of the white man. Why, sir, so zealous have become these reformers in the elevation of the red man that it is scarcely possible to obtain a single expression in any speech or report made by them that by any possible construction can be tortured into an expression of belief that an Indian can do wrong, while all these bristle with sentiments which charge upon the unprotected settler the whole responsibility of all the murders and the bloody Indian wars from which we have suffered. The old maxim, that the king can do no wrong, has been of late years applied almost literally to the Indian. Indeed, so true is this that even such glaring, unprovoked, and heartless murders of defenseless citizens as were perpetrated by the Modocs in Oregon prior to the commencement of the Modoc war are held to result from the acts, as they say, of wicked white men. Such sentiments are a reproach to the men who utter them. They are libels upon the white race, and a gross injustice to our settlers. I find the following report in the Evening Star, of this city, of a few evenings since, of a conference meeting of the board of Indian commissioners and representatives of missionary societies, held recently at the Arlington Hotel, in this city, which will illustrate quite clearly what I mean:

A conference meeting of the board of Indian commissioners and representatives of missionary societies was held yesterday afternoon at the Arlington Hotel, and a resolution that the agents nominated by societies shall receive sufficient salaries, to be regulated by location, was referred to a committee. Mr. Janney opposed the proposed transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. Mr. Dorsey moved that a committee be appointed to draw a memorial to Congress asking that no such transfer be made. After some debate, a resolution offered by Mr. Reed was adopted, indorsing the Indian policy of the Government, and expressing unabated confidence in its ultimate success, of which the happy unity that has thus far existed between the Interior Department, the board of Indian commissioners, and the various missionary organizations is a most grateful indication. Mr. Meacham, one of the members of the Modoc peace commission, and who was shot at the time General Canby was killed, took strong grounds against the change. He claimed that the wrongdoings of the Modocs were caused by wicked white men, and notwithstanding he had suffered from the Indians he would always be their friend. A resolution was adopted that the agricultural industry of the Indians should be fostered by purchasing from them such of their products as the Government may require. The conference then affirmed the resolution regarding the sacredness of the rights of the Indians in the Indian Territory, and the meeting adjourned.

From this report it would seem that the first great question discussed and agreed upon by these missionaries was the question of the salary grab. As the first great step in the work of christianizing the Indians they resolved that the agents nominated by the different religious societies should receive sufficient salaries. This was the vital preliminary in the work of reformation, though just how much, in their judgment, would be sufficient does not appear; neither was it stated whether salaries were to be retroactive or simply prospective. They next resolved, as a body, to oppose any transfer of control of the Indian management from the Interior to the War Department. As a matter of course, the fact that such a transfer would operate as a sudden repeal of all of these salaries, back pay and future as well, had nothing at all to do with bringing about this resolve. They then proceeded to declare in proper form what a happy unity exists between the Interior Department, the board of Indian commissioners, and the various missionary organizations from which these agents who are to have sufficient salaries are selected."

This is all very proper and commendable, as it tends to secure a more faithful disbursement than otherwise might be the case of the many millions of dollars of annual Indian appropriations. If there were a lack of this unity, to such an extent as to lead to any serious disagreement in regard to the expenditure of these appropriations, possibly it might result in a failure to disburse all the moneys appropriated; and hence the poor Indian might suffer. This feature, therefore, of perfect unity that seems to exist, I admit, is encouraging. Whether it is exactly true that such a feeling of unity does actually exist between the board of commissioners and the Interior Department I am not quite certain, but if it does it presents the idea of harmony just as a complete circle or ring of friends, whose ideas, desires, and ambitions being the same, presents to the mind the idea of unity and harmony. Peace Commissioner Meacham then entertained the conference in a speech, in which he is reported to have said:

The wrong-doings of the Modocs were caused by wicked white men, and notwithstanding he had suffered from the Indians he would always be their friend.

I do not object, Mr. President, to that spirit of charity and Christian forgiveness that enables men when one cheek is smitten to meekly turn the other to receive the blow; for I believe this is the doctrine of the Saviour of men; and therefore I do not complain when Mr. Meacham, rising as he did from the blood-smeared rocks of the lava beds, stripped of every vestment and almost of life itself, and with his gaping wounds breathing forth the terrible history of the perfidy and wrong of the Modoc fiends, turns the other cheek also, and declares one of the most infamous assassinations recorded on history's darkest page, and from which he barely escaped alive, to have been in one sense excusable, if not entirely justifiable, and in saying that notwithstanding all he had suffered he would always be the friend of the Indian—I say I have no fault to find with the spirit that enables Mr. Meacham to do this. But when he or any other man makes the assertion that any white man, either good or bad, ever did any act or thing which would in the slightest degree palliate, much less justify, the unprovoked murder by the Modocs of some twenty of Oregon's best and most peaceful citizens in the most cowardly and brutal manner, ending with the assassination of the peace commissioners, then I protest in the name of the truth of history, read and known by all men, against the injustice of this assertion. And when a peace conference composed of peace commissioners will give audience and sanction to such sentiments, then I confess to a feeling of distrust as to their qualifications for the high office they hold, and I regard with serious apprehension as to its final results a policy shaped and controlled by such sentiments.

The whites responsible for the attrocities of the Modocs! Why so? What did the whites do? What right of the Modocs had been violated by them? None whatever. Had their property been taken from them? Not at all. Had they been deprived of their liberties? By no manner of means, for they had by solemn compact agreed to go on the Klamath reservation, and in pursuance of such compact had at one time actually gone. Had their wives or children, or neighbors or friends, been molested in any manner? Such a thing is not contended. Then why say that white men are responsible for the cowardly murders perpetrated by the Modocs?

But in this connection I desire to attract attention to two reports of the peace commissioners, one made last April at the Fifth Avenue Hotel in New York City, and the other a few days since at the Arlington Hotel in this city. From these reports I shall be able to show either that the commissioners are guilty of a willful perversion of facts or that they are grossly ignorant of the subject in regard to which they attempted to treat. In charity I must attribute their unpardonable mistakes to the latter cause; but yet, when I reflect that they had access to all the records of facts, of treaties and the like, in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I feel almost constrained to believe that I myself grossly err in assuming this charitable view. I refer now specially to their treatment of the Modoc question. In the former report, to which I have referred, they use this language:

By this treaty (referring to the treaty of 1864) the Klamath Indians and Modocs ceded to the United States from fifteen to twenty thousand square miles of territory for the comparatively small sum of $17,000, which was appropriated to these Indians by the last Congress.

Nothing, Mr. President, could be more remote from the truth than this statement, made, as it would seem, to justify the Modocs, and to convey the impression to the people that they had been misused and swindled by the Government.

What are the facts? The truth is that the Government had, at the date of this report, paid these Indians $138,211, and still owed them $170,789, making an aggregate of $309,000, instead of $17,000, as stated by the commissioners, which our Government agreed to pay, and is paying as rapidly as it matures under the treaty, for the title which these Klamath and Modoc Indians had, or claimed to have, to these lands ceded by them to the United States by that treaty.

But this is not all. By this same treaty, in addition to this large sum of money, they were given a reservation containing seven hundred and sixty-eight thousand acres of land, over four hundred and twenty-five acres to each Indian, man, woman, and child, of all the tribes, and more than six hundred thousand acres of land more than the same number of white people could hold under any homestead, donation, or pre-emption law of the United States. But as I shall recur to the provisions of this treaty again, I desire now to examine further the report of April, 1873, of the peace commissioners.

They further proceed to say in that report, as a justification of the course pursued by the Indians:

The head chief and that portion of the Modocs who joined in the treaty went upon the reservation according to the agreement, but a majority of the Modocs claimed that they never joined in the treaty, and never sold their country; and so, refusing to go upon the reservation, they remained upon the lands "coveted" by the whites.

What are the facts respecting this Modoc matter and the troubles generally? Simply these. On the 14th day of October, 1864, a treaty was concluded at Klamath Lake, Oregon, between the United States, through their commissioners, J. W. P. Huntington and William Logan, and the Klamath and Modoc tribes of Indians, acting through their chiefs and principal men. By the terms of that treaty the Klamaths and Modocs ceded to the United States all their right, title, interest, and claim in and to all lands outside the limits of Klamath reservation, which reservation was reserved and set aside for their sole use and occupation. Having simply the right of possession to the lands included in this reservation, by virtue of the provisions of the treaty, they obtained the right of property and the absolute fee, as the right of possession simply belongs to the aborigines, and the right of property to the discoverer, and consequently to the Government. And by the terms of this treaty these two tribes of Indians agreed to go and reside there, and not depart therefrom except by permission of the agent or superintendent. There was also a stipulation in this treaty that the Indians should demean themselves properly in all respects, and always thereafter maintain peaceable relations with the whites and with all people, and that they would submit to and obey all laws and regulations which the United States might make and prescribe for their government and conduct.

It must also be borne in mind that Captain Jack, the notorious leader of the Modocs in the lava beds, signed this treaty in person. And again it must be remembered that at the time this treaty was made the Modocs had only four headmen who were the representatives of all their people. Without a single exception these leaders signed this atrety, namely, Schonchin, Stak-it-ut, Keint Poos, (or Captain Jack,) and Chuck-e-i-ox.

July 2, 1866, this treaty, in an amended form, was ratified by the Senate; and the amendments, on the 10th day of December, 1869, were assented to and signed by both tribes, including Captain Jack and the other chiefs; and about that time the whole of the Klamaths and Captain Jack and his tribe of Modocs—including all of the latter—in pursuance of the treaty stipulations, voluntarily entered upon the Klamath reservation.

It will be observed that in the report to which I have alluded the commissioners say "that a portion of the Indians who did not join in the treaty refused to go upon the reservation, and remained on lands coveted by the whites." While in another part of their report they say "that they left the reservation because they were mistreated by the Klamaths."

If they never went upon the reservation, and if they remained on lands coveted by the whites outside the reservation, how then, I would inquire, could they ever leave it? Two statements could not well be made more inconsistent; but in this instance, to add to the surprise that either should be made, is the fact that they are both false. Jack and all the Modocs did go upon the reservation; they remained there some two months, at the expiration of which time, without any real cause, and without the consent of the superintendent or agent, and in direct violation of the terms of the treaty. they left it; that is, Captain Jack and his band of desperate men left Klamath reservation and went to the vicinity of Lost River in the midst of white settlers, and peremptorily and sulkily refused to return, although repeated efforts were made to induce them to do so. Promises and threats proved equally unavailing; and the more frequently they were repeated the more insolent and defiant became Jack and his Modoc band.

When the Indians ceded their lands to the Government on Lost River and Tule Lake, and left there in December, 1869, these lands were thrown open to settlement and were soon occupied by white settlers, as it was their perfect right to do; and it was the duty of the Government to protect these settlers in their rights of life, liberty, and property.

The commissioners, in a tone not entirely free from derision, sneeringly say that "the Indians remained upon lands coveted by the whites." Had not these same lands been thrown open to settlement by virtue of a solemn treaty with these same Indians? Had not the Modocs surrendered and conveyed to the Government and to the whites all their interest in these same lands for a large and valuable consideration? Had not the Indian title of possession been extinguished in due form of law? And was not the United States Government as much bound to protect these settlers from the insolence and depredations of this rebellious and trespassing band of Indians as it is to protect the homes and families of the board of Indian commissioners against the depredations of any foreign power with whom we have treated? Why, then, say that those lands were "coveted" by the whites?

The term used by the board is not used by accident; it is purposely employed; it is a term that conveys in its ordinary acceptation the idea of a great wrong, an inordinate desire, avariciousness; and this is the sense in which the term is used in the report.

"Thou shalt not covet" is the last but not the least of the Ten Commandments. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, * * nor his man servant, nor his maid servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's."

Is it true that the men who penetrate the depths of the forest with their wives and their little children, and there, upon lands purchased from the Indians by solemn treaty and paid for by the Government first and by themselves afterward, strive to build up a home for themselves and families, shall be characterized in their actions by terms imputing to them a violation of the tenth commandment?

But a reference to the more recent report of the board of peace commissioners, that of January 30, of the present year, discloses a tenacity of adherence upon the part of the board in its disposition to misrepresent, and to glorify the Indian at the expense of the white man, which in a different cause might be worthy of admiration. The report contains this language:

> Early in the year the deplorable events of the Modoc rebellion produced serious apprehensions in the public mind in regard to the designs of other Indian tribes in Oregon, and a distrust of the peace policy, which were not shared by those conversant with the subject. The peaceable conduct of the Indians and the fact which came to be understood that the peace policy was in no way responsible for the Modoc war, but on the contrary would have prevented it, soon dissipated both the apprehensions and distrust.

How, in the face of the bald facts of history, this board can assert that the peace policy "would have prevented the Modoc war" is, to one conversant with these facts, somewhat difficult to perceive. Not content with the assertion that the peace policy was in no way responsible for the Modoc war, of the truth of which there are grave doubts, they make the remarkable declaration, on the contrary, that this policy would have prevented it.

Why, is it not a fact that this peace policy was adopted by the Government in its dealings with these Indians, and adhered to against the solemn protests of the people of Oregon, and of her Representatives in Congress, until its commissioners were stricken down by the arm of treachery, and the commission instantly dissolved by the brutal assassination of a majority of its members and the maiming for life of the remainder?

The peace policy prevent a war, when its advocates and agents are cruelly slaughtered while attempting to enforce its edicts beneath the shadow of a flag of truce! It can scarcely be contended that the persistence with which the peace policy was urged in this instance, in face of all absence of any hope of success, did not contribute to the Canby and Thomas massacre. On March 4, 1873, the administration was telegraphed, by the peace commission itself, in these words:

> The Modocs emphatically reject all offers and propositions. This undoubtedly means treachery. The commission is a failure.

And then it is gravely asserted, in the same paragraph of the report, that the fact that the peace policy was not the cause of the war, but, on the contrary, would have prevented it, coming to be understood by the public, soon dissipated all apprehensions and distrust as to the designs of other Indian tribes in Oregon. What is the fact in reference to this matter? Simply this: While the Government was tampering with these Modocs through the instrumentality of the peace commission there was, and it cannot be denied, a serious dread in the public mind of a general outbreak by the Snakes, Klamaths, and other tribes. These fears were not without alarming reasons for support, for their war-dances and councils gave abundant evidence that they were not groundless.

But what prevented this general outbreak and dispelled these fears? Was it either the success of the peace policy, or a knowledge in the public mind that such a policy would have stopped the Modoc troubles? Not by any means, sir; but, on the contrary, it was the fact that on the assassination of General Canby and Dr. Thomas the nation became aroused with indignation, and was alarmed at the fruits of this Quaker policy. The military power of the Government was invoked to solve a problem for which the words of peace and the arts of civil diplomacy could find no solution. General Jeff. C. Davis with his army struck a blow that overwhelmed the conspirators and sent a word of warning into the ears of every tribe on the North Pacific coast, a blow and a warning that did more to secure peace to the country than all the peace commissioners ever have done or ever can do. The peace commissioners who have done the most for Oregon the past few years are Generals Crook and Davis.

The commissioners further say that—

> They do not find any serious offense had been proven against the band of Modocs until the commencement of the untoward strife.

In the face of the statements contained in almost every report of civil and military authority ever made, to the effect that these Indians were violating their treaty obligations and trespassing upon the rights of the settlers, this would seem to be a most singular assertion.

It is perhaps true that, in the opinion of this very peaceably inclined board, the levying of black-mail upon citizens powerless to protect themselves and compelled to submit to piratical exactions plundering them of their stock, provisions, and stores, insulting their wives and daughters in the absence of their husbands and fathers, and threatening their lives, are not "serious offenses." Such conduct upon the part of white men would be, in the estimation of most people, little less than flagrant crimes. If they are not serious offenses when committed by Indians, then there are prerogatives and immunities indeed under our laws attaching to the Indian which do not attach to the white race; and in such case the latter is peculiarly unfortunate in being white.

The people are heavily taxed to meet the expenses necessarily incurred in making and enforcing our laws, to the end that every man within the territorial jurisdiction of those laws may be protected in the most sacred of all rights—life, liberty, and property. All governments have this end in view; but especially was our Government ordained and established by the people, not only for the purpose of forming a more perfect union, but "to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Its highest office and proudest privilege consists in guaranteeing to every man, of every race and condition, full and complete protection to all his natural rights of life, liberty, and property. Whenever it fails for any cause to defend its humblest citizen against the encroachments of the wrong-doer, even though he may reside on the borders of the continent and on the outskirts of civilization, and though such wrong-doer be an Indian, the first object of government is defeated; it becomes a useless piece of machinery; so that our boasted rights and privileges as American citizens may be said to be worse than delusions and existing only in imagination.

I would have the Indian treated in a humane and proper manner: I would throw around him in his weakness and ignorance and superstition not only the forms, but all the substantial protection of the laws, elevating him, so far as in my power, from his primary condition of barbarism to the higher plane of civilization and Christian life. But I am not willing that special privileges shall be accorded him, such as plundering and murdering our citizens, despoiling their possessions, and laying waste their homes. I would hold him to a strict accountability before the law for each violation of its mandates; and when he committed murder I would call it murder, under the law, and instead of sending him to a distant reservation, to be kept by the Government, I would have him tried by the judiciary and the laws of the State, and if found guilty I would have him treated just as the law would treat a white man under like circumstances—hanged by the neck between the earth and the sky until he is dead.

But I desire to trace more fully the history of the Modoc troubles, for the purpose of showing just where the responsibility rests.

After repeated efforts on the part of Mr. Meacham, who was then superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, to induce the Modocs to return to their agency, all of which proved abortive, he had some verbal understanding with them to the effect that they might remain where they were until he could make an effort to induce the Government to give them a new reservation in that vicinity. In January, 1872, Mr. Meacham requested General Canby, then in command of the Department of the Columbia, to furnish troops to enable him to remove them forcibly to the Klamath reservation. This General Canby declined to do, giving as a reason this verbal promise of the superintendent that they might remain on Lost River until he (Meacham) could succeed in securing them a reservation there.

As an evidence of the manner in which Superintendent Meacham regarded the conduct of the Modocs at that time, I quote the following extract from a letter written by him to General Canby, February 8, 1872, in response to the general's refusal to furnish troops to remove the Modocs back to Klamath reservation. He says:

> They have not kept their part of the agreement, and hence have forfeited any claim they might have had to forbearance.

A petition (a copy of which I hold in my hand) signed by forty-five settlers residing in the vicinity of Lost River and Tule Lake, and addressed to Superintendent Meacham, about 25th January, 1872, will convey some idea of the reign of terror then existing in that region, and the jeopardy to which the lives and property of those settlers were then subjected. I will read it:

> Hon. A. B. MEACHAM,
> Superintendent Indian Affairs:
> General CANBY,
> Commanding Department Columbia:
> We, the undersigned, citizens of Lost and Link River, Klamath and Tule Lake country, after suffering years of annoyance from the presence of the Modoc Indians, who, through the delay of the Indian and Military Departments, have not been removed to the reservation, as required by the treaty stipulations of 1864, entered into by the authorized agents of the Government and the chiefs of the Modoc Indians, by which all their lands were ceded to the United States except those embraced in the reservation, as stipulated in said treaty. But notwithstanding all the conditions of said treaty have been faithfully performed on the part of the Government, it is a well-known fact that a factious band of the Modocs, of about three hundred, who were parties to that treaty, have, through the influence of citizens of an adjoining State, who have been engaged in an illicit traffic with them, have been instigated to set the authority of the Government at defiance, and to utterly refuse compliance with their treaty stipulations by going on the reservation; and since there is no longer any conflict between the Indian and Military Departments, such as prevent Sub-agent Applegate from bringing those Indians on the reservation, we, therefore, make this earnest appeal to you for relief—knowing that you have the cavalry force we petitioned to be sent to Fort Klamath two years ago for this specific purpose at your command. We ask you to use it for the purpose it was procured for, that the departments, both civil and military, have not been kept ignorant of the fact that we have been repeatedly on the verge of a desolating Indian war with this band of outlaws, who, by your delay to enforce the treaty, have been led to despise, rather than respect, the authority of the Government.
> Their long-continued success in defying its authorities has emboldened them in their defiant and hostile bearing, until further forbearance on our part would cease to be a virtue; that, in many instances, our families have become alarmed at their threats to kill and burn, until we were compelled to remove them for safety across the Cascade Mountains, thereby suffering great loss of time and property; that the agents at Klamath and commissary at Yainax, during this long delay growing out of this unfortunate conflict of departments, have done all they could to prevent a war and bring about an amicable adjustment of our troubles we have no reason to doubt; but we ask now, since no such conflict exists, shall a petty Indian chief, with twenty desperadoes, and a squalid band of three hundred miserable savages, any longer set at defiance the strong arm of the Government, driving our citizens from their homes, threatening their lives, and destroying our property?

Their removal to the reservation in the winter season may be easily accomplished by any one acquainted with them and their country, and will not require more force than could be furnished from Fort Klamath to do it. We recommended Commissary I. D. Applegate, of Yainax, to the consideration of the department as a suitable man to take charge of any force or expedition looking to their removal. His long connection with the Indian Department, and thorough knowledge of them and their country, and all the facts connected with this whole Modoc question, and as a stock-raiser equally interested with us in their removal, point him out to us as the right man in the right place in charge of this much-needed expedition for the removal of this band of Modocs to their reservation, for which your petitioners will ever pray.

I also read an extract from another petition, signed by 65 citizens of Lost River, Klamath and Tule Lake country, addressed to Governor Grover about the same time, and in which they pray that protection may be awarded them. They use this language:

Our reasons for this request are these: We have been harassed and bothered for the last four years by this renegade band of lawless Modoc Indians. They are extremely saucy and menacing in their repeated threats against settlers and their stock; they set up a claim to our homes; they frequently draw guns and pistols on inoffensive citizens; they recently fired at the house of citizen Ball; they watch the men leave their houses, and then go to the house and insult the female inmates of our sacred homes; they boast defiance to the authorities, &c.

These petitions were sent by Hon. A. B. Meacham, then superintendent of Indian affairs, to General Canby, accompanied by a letter in these words:

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Salem, Oregon, January 25, 1872.

SIR: Inclosed please find a petition from citizens of Jackson County, Oregon, for removal of Modoc Indians. I would respectfully ask that the said Indians be removed to Yainax Station, on Klamath reservation, by the military force now at Fort Klamath. I would also suggest that sufficient force be sent on this mission to insure success, say fifty men. I have ordered arrangements to subsist the Modocs at the place above named, and have instructed I. D. Applegate, commissary at Yainax, to confer with commander at post, and accompany said expedition if agreeable to your department. Now, if it is not consistent with your views on the subject to comply with the above request, I would respectfully ask that a military force of the number designated be placed, subject to requisition of Commissary Applegate, for the purpose above stated. Winter is the only time to successfully operate against these Indians.

I regret very much the necessity of this action, but the peace and welfare of white settlers and Indians demand that it be done promptly.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. B. MEACHAM,
Superintendent Indian Affairs in Oregon.

General E. R. S. CANBY,
Commanding Department of Columbia, Portland, Oregon.

Notwithstanding these repeated and earnest appeals no troops were furnished, and so the treaty-breaking and blood-thirsty Modocs were left to terrorize over the unprotected settlers.

About the 1st of April, 1872, Hon. T. B. Odeneal superseded Mr. Meacham as superintendent of Indian affairs for the Oregon superintendency.

As an attempt has been made in certain quarters to throw the responsibility of the Modoc war upon the management of Mr. Odeneal, as a matter of simple justice to an able, honest, and efficient officer, I desire to show by official records that any such insinuation is as untrue in fact as it is unjust in character. Shortly after Mr. Odeneal took possession of the office, April 11, 1872, Major Elmer Otis, of the First Cavalry, commanding the district of the lakes, addressed him a letter, in which this language appears:

SALEM, OREGON, April 11, 1872.

SIR: * * * * * * * *

I would recommend that the permission for Captain Jack's band of Modocs to remain where they now are, until the question of a new reservation be decided, in the vicinity of Tule Lake, given by Mr. Meacham, be withdrawn, and that they be directed to go on the Klamath reservation as per treaty of October, 1864; that this order be given some time in the latter part of September, so that in case they refuse the military authorities could put them upon the reservation the following winter—the best time for "corraling" them, should they prove refractory; that at least two of their leaders, Captain Jack and Black Jim, be removed from them and sent to Siletz, or any other place you might suggest. * * * *

The reasons why I make this recommendation with reference to the Modocs is, that where they are now they are very insolent, insulting to families, and the settlers are generally of the opinion that they are dangerous to both life and property. I do not believe they will live where they now are in peace with the whites any length of time, without the presence of a military force sufficiently large to make them behave themselves. There is now a force of fifty men and three officers in their immediate country.

I would propose, and strongly recommend, that We-ah-was's band, Oche-hoes's band, the band at McDermit, and the band on the Truckee reservation, or Pyramid Lake reservation, (official name of the reservation not known by me,) be brought on a reservation on the head-waters of the Malheur, or Stein's Mountain country.

I make the above recommendations, after commanding the military districts of Nevada, Owyhee, and district of the lakes, successively, since December of 1867.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ELMER OTIS,
Major First Cavalry, Commanding District of the Lakes.

T. B. ODENEAL,
Superintendent Indian Affairs.

And in his report to General Canby, bearing date April 15, 1872, Major Otis said:

They (the Modocs) signed a treaty in October, 1864, to go on the Klamath reservation. They came on the reservation in the fall of 1869. A portion of them, with the old chief, still remain, but Captain Jack, who signed the treaty in 1864, became dissatisfied soon after coming on the reservation, and in February, 1870, formed a band, numbering now probably sixty warriors, and left the reservation, going to Lost River and Tule Lake. Last fall Superintendent Meacham promised to allow them to remain where they are until he could see if a small reservation could not be set aside for them on the north end of Tule Lake. These Indians are still in this country, and are insolent and insulting in many instances to the white settlers, and the latter generally deem this band of Modocs unsafe to both life and property. If a military force was present they could probably be removed peaceably to Camp Yainax, on Klamath reservation, and by removing the Pi-Utes now there, would leave them homes and farms for their cultivation. I am of the opinion that if left where they now are, it will probably lead to serious outbreak in time.

On the 12th of April, 1872, Hon. F. A. Walker, then Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed Superintendent Odeneal a letter instructing him in positive terms to have the Modocs removed, if practicable, to their reservation. That letter reads:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1872.

SIR: I inclose herewith copies of papers received by this Department by reference from the honorable Secretary of War, in reference to the hostile attitude of, and apprehended trouble with, the Modoc tribe of Indians.

You are instructed to have the Modoc Indians removed, if practicable, to the reservation set apart for them under the treaty concluded with said Indians October 14, 1864, and, if removed, to see that they are properly protected from the Klamath Indians.

If they cannot be removed or be kept on their reservation, you will report your views as to the practicability of locating them at some other point, and if favorable to such location, you will give a description by natural boundaries, if no other can be given, of the reservation that should be set aside for them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. A. WALKER,
Commissioner.

T. B. ODENEAL, Esq.,
Superintendent Indian Affairs, Salem, Oregon.

The execution of this order was referred by Superintendent Odeneal to L. S. Dyar, United States Indian agent at Klamath agency, and Ivon D. Applegate, commissary in charge of Camp Yainax, on Klamath reservation, who on 14th of May, 1872, met the chiefs and head-men of the Modocs, those on, as well as those off, of the reservation, at a military camp on Lost River, and there used every argument to induce Jack and his band to return peaceably to their reservation. Every guarantee of protection to all the rights and privileges enjoyed by the Klamaths were proffered them, but without avail. They sullenly and peremptorily refused to return or to be bound by their treaty stipulations. Messrs. Dyar and Applegate, in their report to Superintendent Odeneal, use this language:

The Modocs, as parties to the treaty of 1864, ceded to the United States the very country over which they are now roving. Their right being thus extinguished, the country was thrown open to settlement; much of it has been located as State land, and nearly every foot fit for cultivation has been taken up by settlers, whose thousands of horses, cattle, and sheep, are ranging over it. The country where these Modocs are is a pastoral region, not an agricultural country, and to undertake to maintain them on a small reservation there would probably cost more than to furnish them and the Klamaths on Klamath reservation, which is so well fitted by its various resources, as a home for them.

On the 17th of June, 1872, Superintendent Odeneal reported to Commissioner Walker, in these words:

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Salem, Oregon, June 17, 1872.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 12th of April last, inclosing copies of papers from the honorable Secretary of War, in reference to the hostile attitude of, and apprehended trouble with, the Modoc Indians, I have the honor to report that, in pursuance of your instructions therein contained, I at once directed Agent Dyar, of Klamath agency, and Ivon D. Applegate, commissary in charge of Camp Yainax, to meet the chiefs and head-men of said tribe of Indians, and endeavor to persuade them to go upon the Klamath reservation, authorizing the assurance to be given that they should be fully protected.

A council was held with said Indians on the 14th ultimo, and the result thereof is contained in the report of Mr. Applegate, (approved by Mr. Dyar,) a copy of which is herewith inclosed. I referred the matter to the gentleman named, for the reason that Mr. Applegate has for many years been intimately acquainted with these Indians, speaks their language, and possesses their confidence to an extent equal to any one else. (See indorsement of Mr. Applegate by the settlers in that country, in the petition herewith published.)

The leaders of these Indians are desperadoes—brave, daring, and reckless—and their superior sagacity enables them to exercise full and complete control over the rest of the tribe. They have for so long a time been permitted to do as they please that they imagine they are too powerful to be controlled by the Government, and that they can, with impunity, defy its authority. This, in my opinion, is the whole secret of their insubordination. They must, in some way, be convinced of their error in this respect, by such firm, decided action as will leave no doubt in their minds in regard to the fact that we intend that they must be obedient to law and faithful to their treaty obligations. This need not, and with proper management will not, I think, require the use of force. When they shall have been thus convinced, we can, with reasonable hope of success, commence the work of civilizing and transforming them from their present savage state into peaceable, self-controlling, and self-supporting men and women.

Unless the leaders shall in some way be restrained from pursuing the reckless, defiant course they have heretofore been permitted to pursue, all theories in regard to their advancement in civilization must fail. As well might we expect our own youth to practice Christian virtues under the tutorship of the "bandits of the Osage," or the "road agents" of Montana, as to think of instilling any good into the minds of the Modocs while under the exclusive control of their present leaders.

I think the most effectual way to bring about a peaceful solution of the troubles is to take the head-men into custody and hold them at some point remote from their tribe until they shall agree to behave themselves. We deprive white men of their liberty as a reformatory measure, and it could not be less humane to pursue the same course toward these chiefs.

Not long since I had a conversation with Major Elmer Otis, who was in command of the troops in the district including these Indians, in which he expressed the opinion that all trouble with them could be settled by arresting the leaders, and compelling the others to go upon Klamath reservation; but it was his opinion that positive orders should not be given to this effect until about the last of September, so that in case of refusal the military could compel obedience. His opinion, as well as that of Messrs. Applegate and Dyar, and all others from whom I have obtained any information, is that Camp Yainax, on Klamath reservation, is the best place in that whole country for the Modocs; that they will be as well contented and as easily kept there as at any other place that could be selected, and I agree with them; and therefore respectfully report against the propriety of locating them elsewhere.

Very respectfully, you obedient servant,

T. B. ODENEAL,
Superintendent Indian Affairs, Oregon.

Hon. F. A. WALKER,
Commissioner, &c., Washington, D. C.

It will be observed from this communication that while Superintendent Odeneal recommended, in the strongest terms, the removal of the Modocs to the Klamath reservation, he at the same time expressed an opinion that in effecting this removal it "need not, and with proper management would not, require the use of force."

In reply to this, Commissioner Walker wrote to Mr. Odeneal, July 6, 1872, in these words:

Your recommendations, so far as the Modoc Indians are concerned, are approved, and you are directed to remove them to Klamath reservation, peaceably if you can, but forcibly if you must, at the time suggested in your report.

In pursuance of this peremptory order Superintendent Odeneal proceeded immediately to Klamath agency, where, learning that Captain Jack and his band were then camped on Lost River, he dispatched Messenger James Brown and Commissary I. D. Applegate to the camp of the rebel Indians with this message:

Say to them that I wish to meet the head-men at Link River, on the 27th instant, and to talk with them. Impress upon them the importance of meeting me. Tell them that I entertain none but the most friendly feelings for them, and that the object of the interview sought is to advance their interests and promote their welfare; that I have made ample provisions for their comfortable subsistence at Camp Yainax, on Klamath reservation, and desire to have them go there and receive their proportion of the annuities; that if they will go with you to the reservation within a reasonable time—as soon as they can get ready—they shall be fairly and justly dealt with, and fully protected in all their rights against any injustice which other tribes might be disposed to do them. If they agree to go with you, say to them that they need not meet me as requested, and that I will see them at Yainax. In the event they decline to go to the reservation, you will say they must meet me at Link River, as I desire to, and must, come to a positive understanding with them.

To this last appeal the Modocs turned an insolent and deaf ear, and peremptorily refused to go. Captain Jack made a speech, in which he said:

Say to the superintendent that we do not wish to see him or to talk with him. We do not want any white man to tell us what to do. I am tired of being talked to, and am done with talking.

Here, then, was the ultimatum. Jack and his rebel Modoc band, after baffling and trifling with the Government and its agents for over eight years, during all which time the olive branch of peace was held out to them, a home provided them in pursuance of their own treaty stipulations, protection guaranteed them in all their rights of person and property, assistance supplied them in the form of annuities, at last, with all the self-importance of a foreign state, defied the whole civil and military power of the Republic, and signalized their intention to wage a most fiendish and indiscriminate warfare by murdering in their homes some eighteen or twenty peaceable settlers, and destroying and carrying off their property, and that of other citizens and settlers.

Notwithstanding the repeated efforts made to induce them to return to their reservation, and their persistent refusal so to do, when the military were directed to proceed against them still another effort was made to effect conciliation. Superintendent Odeneal, at one o'clock on the morning of the 29th of November, 1872, gave to Captain Jackson, who, with thirty men, was directed by Major Green, First Cavalry, commanding the post, to proceed to the Modoc camp, these instructions:

When you arrive at the camp of the Modocs request an interview with the head-men, and say to them that you did not come to fight or to harm them, but to have them go peacefully to Camp Yainax, on Klamath reservation, where ample provision has been made for their comfortable subsistence, and where by their treaty they agreed to live. Talk kindly but firmly with them, and whatever else you may do I desire to urge that if there is any fighting let the Indians be the aggressors; fire not a gun, except in self-defense, after they have first fired upon you.

On the arrival there of Captain Jackson and his men he repeated to the leaders of the band Mr. Odeneal's instructions, and resorted to every argument at his command to induce them to obey, and thus avoid a collision, but, all such efforts proving unavailing, Captain Jackson demanded that they lay down their arms. Then Scar-Faced Charley, one of the leaders of the desperadoes, with a terrible oath and Indian yell, declared that he would shoot one officer, and at once fired at Lieutenant Boutelle, he meanwhile having repaired to his tent, painted his face, and returned clad in war costume. Thus commenced the famous Modoc war, that has cost our Government so much money and so many valuable lives.

As I have said already, an indiscriminate slaughter then began, not of the soldiers, but of the peaceable settlers of Southern Oregon, re-enacting another one of those massacres of defenseless citizens of our State that have so often, and at no lengthy intervals, since 1834 to the present time, drenched our territory with the blood of our pioneers.

The peace commissioners assert in their report of April, 1873, in referring to the special board of peace commissioners appointed to treat with the Modocs, that—

Meanwhile the local authorities indicted the Indians for murder, the effort to stop the profitable war was violently opposed, and every possible obstacle was thrown in the way of the special commissioners.

The very reverse of this is true; for had not the peace commissioners been appointed, the war would have soon ended by the defeat of the Modocs. The only effect of the appointment of this commission was to give the Indians time in which to intrench themselves in the strongholds of the lava beds. It was winter; the commissioners supplied them with food; they accepted it until spring came, when they could supply themselves, and then they smote the very hand that fed them, and, with the mockery of a flag of truce, waged wicked and indiscriminate war.

This report further asserts that the commissioners first appointed seem to have been intimidated by the pressure of opponents of the peace policy, and so Messrs. Stelle and Applegate resigned. This refers to Hon. Jesse Applegate; and I now beg to quote from a letter of that gentleman to Superintendent Meacham, February 1, 1872, so as to show what he thought of these Modocs at that time. He said:

That they are not obedient, quiet, and orderly, is proven by their absence from the reservation assigned them, and having broken away from it in defiance of the agent and the military, and all those conciliatory means used to induce them to return. They misunderstood your forbearance and humanity, and thought your policy dictated by weakness and fear; and the audacity with which they commit aggressions and levy black-mail upon the settlers encourages and confirms that belief. From advices from that quarter, their arrogance and impudence have been greater than ever before, and the patience of settlers is well-nigh exhausted. The Modocs help themselves to whatever they want when, by intimidation, they fail to obtain permission. This state of things discourages new settlers, and keeps those in the country in a feverish state of uneasiness and alarm, and instead of their increased numbers driving the Indians into a better behavior, the Indian number, in the meanwhile, is recruited by the bad and discontented flying to them from the neighboring reservations, and being concentrated in a body, they actually hold the settlements on Lost and Link Rivers at their mercy. Perfectly aware of this fact, they use it to their own advantage. These Indians sold their country which they now forcibly occupy, and years ago received their part of the payment.

Mr. Applegate, speaking further in this same letter, says:

If the commissioners who now control Indian affairs have no regard for the lives of white men, women, and children, there are other reasons for the removal of these Indians to their reservation, which may be in accordance with their tender sympathy for the welfare of the Indians themselves. While a body of independent and defiant Indians makes a city of refuge within a day's travel of two reservations it will scarcely be possible to introduce or enforce the discipline so necessary and proper a preliminary to the pious and innocent life the Indians are to live under their auspices. Moral suasion may not be a sufficient restraint upon the vicious red man any more than upon the vicious white man. Some kind of physical punishment must be the penalty of crime. Such impious characters, until they learn to be "meek under chastening," will fly to the "city of refuge" rather than quietly submit to be hanged, whipped, or otherwise punished for their crimes. Hence those most in need of the lessons of the moral teacher will be out of his reach.

Poets and moralists argue that the "untutored savage" is also a "wild man;" and that like other wild animals they chafe and fret under any kind of restraint, preferring the liberty and license of the "city of refuge" to even the mild restraints of a pious life on the reservation. The consequence will be that the "city of refuge" will overflow with inhabitants and the reservations be left desolate. The people of the "city of refuge," like those of other cities, must be fed and clothed. The white settlers in its vicinity having by their stock and farming operations diminished the spontaneous productions of the land will have to pay tribute to the city. The collectors of the tax may be rude, rough men, (red though they be,) who are not likely to observe those formalities which reconcile tame people to be robbed in the name of law.

The truth is, Mr. President, the career of the Modocs, the Snakes, the Pi-Utes, and some other tribes of Indians in Oregon, is one of blood. The evidence of this are the bleaching bones of hundreds of emigrants and settlers that to-day whiten our territory with their decaying dust. The assertion, so often made, that the Indian wars of Oregon have been the result of the unjust oppressions of the whites is false in fact and libelous in intention and character. For years Congress labored with commendable zeal to enact such legislation as would induce the settlement of Oregon by the whites, and thus wrest it from the grasp of the British Crown; but from the first of these settlements almost to the present hour they have suffered severely for that protection properly due them from the Government.

The Indian massacres of American citizens in Oregon commenced in 1834, on the Umpqua, where a party of about thirty were slaughtered by the most infamous treachery. It was known as Smith's party, and but two out of the whole number escaped alive, while some fifty more were scattered among the Indians, many of them captured and carried into captivity.

In 1847 Dr. Marcus Whitman, a Christian man and a true philanthropist, and whose life labors had been given to the elevation of these same Indians, together with his wife and eleven of his companions, was massacred by the Cayuses and Walla Wallas without the slightest shadow of provocation. Painted Shirt, one of the chiefs of the Cayuses, who engaged in this massacre, immediately afterward took a wife from the female captives, a young and beautiful girl of fourteen. In order to gain her quiet submission to his wishes he threatened to take the life of her mother and younger sister. Thus in the power of savages, in a new and wild country, remote from civilization, cut off from all hope of restoration, she yielded herself to one whose hands were yet red with the blood of an elder brother.

In 1852 some of these same Modoc fiends and their ancestors stood as bloody sentinels of destruction along the line of the emigrant road. A company of soldiers sent out to protect the settlers found and buried some forty bodies at one time. These soldiers were accompanied by volunteers, under Ben Wright, who met in open warfare a portion of the Indian murderers and slew them in battle; and this is all there is of the Ben Wright massacre, of which we have heard so much. The war in Southern Oregon in 1853 was commenced by the Indians by the brutal and unprovoked murders of our white settlers.

The Rogue River and Yakima wars, in 1855–'56, were instituted in a similar manner. Again in 1858–'59 all Eastern Oregon was terrorized by marauding Indians, principally the Snakes, resulting in the most sanguinary slaughter and fiendish murders of emigrants.

From 1865 to 1870, for three hundred miles along the emigrant and other roads, and also through the settlements in the eastern portion of Oregon, the Snakes held high carnival over the lives and property of our citizens.

In order that some faint comprehension may be had of the trials of early settlers in Oregon, I desire to invite attention to the report of a committee appointed by the Legislature of that then Territory, in February, 1858, showing the murders committed prior to that date in time of peace, by Indians supposed to be friendly. And I refer to this report as a fair illustration of what has taken place every year since then, ending with the recent slaughter of the Modocs within the last year:

Your committee, to whom were referred the governor's message, and resolution (No. ——) relative to the protection of immigrants in 1854, with instructions to report, as far as practicable, the number, date, places, and names of persons killed by Oregon Indians and their allies in times of peace, and those killed in times of war by Indians supposed to be friendly, submit the following report:

The deadly hostility of the Indians inhabiting the extreme northern and southern portions of our Territory may be traced back to a very early period.

As far back as 1834, a party of about thirty persons, under the control of Captain Smith, were massacred near the mouth of the Umpqua River.

In June, 1835, George Gay, Daniel Miller, Edward Burnes, Dr. Bailey, Mr. Sanders, John Turner, John Woodworth, and an Irishman, called Tom, were attacked by Rogue River Indians near where Mr. Birdseye now lives, in Rogue River Valley, and Mr. Miller, Mr. Burns, Mr. Sanders, and Tom were killed. The other four were badly wounded, but made their escape.

In August, 1838, as a party of citizens of Oregon were driving the first cattle from California to this Territory, they were attacked near the same spot where the party was attacked in 1835 by the same Indians, and Mr. Gay, who was of the party of 1835, was again wounded.

In the fall of 1846, a sick immigrant was killed on the Southern Oregon emigrant road near Lost River, by Modoc Indians.

On the 29th November, 1847, Dr. Whitman, a Protestant missionary, his wife, two orphan children, a Frenchman, and about eleven emigrants, were massacred at and near the mission in Walla Walla Valley, by Cayuse Indians. This was the commencement of the Cayuse war.

In August, 1850, Mr. Spink and Mr. Cushing, of Maine, killed by Klamath Indians on Klamath River.

In January, 1851, James Sloan, Messrs. Janalshan, Bender, and Blackburn, of Ohio, killed by the Indians next above alluded to.

In the spring of 1851 two men were killed on Grave Creek, and one or two more on Rogue River by Rogue River Indians, for which they were chastised by Major Kearney, United States Army. It was in some of Major Kearney's engagements with these Indians that Captain Stewart, United States Army, was killed.

In 1851 an exploring party of eight or ten men were attacked near the mouth of Coquille River, in Southern Oregon, and six of their number killed: Cornelius Doherty, of Texas; Jeremiah Ryan, of Maryland; John Holland, of New Hampshire; John P. Pepper and Pat Murphy, of New York.

In May, 1851, William Mosier and Mr. Beaver, of Maine, killed by Rogue River and Shasta Indians, near Yreka, California.

In May, 1851, Mr. Dilley was killed near Camp Stewart, on Rogue River Valley, by Rogue River Indians.

In October, 1851, Mr. Moffitt was killed by the same Indians near the same place.

In June, 1852, Calvin Woodman was killed in Scott's Valley, California, by Rogue River Indians.

In June, 1852, James L. Freavor, John Brando, "Cayuse" Jackson, and "Adobi" John, a Mexican, were killed by Pitt River Indians, in the valley of that name, while viewing a wagon-road from Sacramento Valley to the southern boundary line in Oregon.

In July, 1852, Mr. Warner, a member of Colonel Freanor's exploring party, killed with the balance of the party as before specified.

In August, 1852, Felix Martin and Mr. Wood killed by Modoc Indians on the Southern Oregon emigrant road.

In August, 1852, Mr. Coats, John Ornsby, James Long, and thirty-three immigrants were murdered by the Modoc Indians on the Southern Oregon emigrant road.

In December, 1852, William Grendage, Peter Hunter, James Bacon and brother Mr. Bruner, William Allen, and Mr. Palmer were massacred by Rogue River Indians on Rogue River, near the mouth of Galuse Creek.

In the summer of 1853 "California" Jack was killed on Smith's River by Klamath Indians, eight miles from Crescent City; and about the same time, at the same place, and by the same Indians, Mr. Bell and partner were killed.

In 1853, August 4, Edward Edwards was killed by Rogue River Indians in his own house on Stewart's Creek.

August 5, 1853, Thomas Wills was mortally wounded by Rogue River Indians within three hundred yards of the town of Jacksonville.

August 6, 1853, Richard Nolan was killed by Rogue River Indians, on Jackson Creek, one mile from the town of Jacksonville.

August 17, 1853, John Gibbs, William Hudgins, and three others, whose names are not known, were killed in Rogue River Valley by Rogue River Indians.

October 6, 1853, James C. Kyle was killed by Rogue River Indians two miles from Fort Lane and about six from Jacksonville. The actual murderer of Mr. Kyle and those who murdered Edwards and Wills were subsequently arrested, and were tried for their offenses before the Hon. O. B. McFadden, in the spring of 1854, and were convicted and hung. These three Indians, with those chastised by Major Kearney in 1851, are the only ones ever punished for crime by either the civil or military authorities in Southern Oregon.

In January, 1854, Hiram Hulen, John Clark, John Oldfield, and Wesley Mayden were killed, between Jacksonville and Yreka, by Rogue River, Shasta, and Modoc Indians.

April 15, 1854, Edward Phillips was killed on Applegate Creek, near Fort Lane, by Rogue River Indians.

June 15, 1854, Daniel Gage was killed while crossing the Siskiyou Mountains, between Jacksonville and Yreka.

June 24, 1854, Captain McAmy was killed at De Witt's Ferry, on Klamath River, by Shasta and Rogue River Indians.

In the summer of 1854 Thomas O'Neil was killed by Klamath Indians on Klamath River; and in the fall of the same year A. French was killed by Klamath Indians near Crescent City.

August 20, 1854, Alexander Ward, his wife, and seven children; Mrs. White and child, Samuel Mulligan, Dr. Adams and brother, William Babcock, John Frederick and Rudolph Schultz, Mr. Ames, and a Frenchman, name unknown, were massacred by Snake Indians, on the Northern Oregon emigrant road, near Fort Boise.

In September, 1854, Mr. Stewart was killed by Indians on the middle route to Oregon via the plains.

May 8, 1855, Mr. Hill was killed on Indian Creek by Rogue River Indians.

June 1, 1855, Jerome Dyer and Daniel McKerr were killed by Rogue River Indians on the road between Jacksonville and Illinois Valley.

July 27, 1855, Mr. Peters was killed on Humbug Creek by Klamath, Shasta, and Rogue River Indians.

July 28, 1855, William Hennessey, Edward Parrish, Thomas Grey, Peter Hignight, John Pollock, four Frenchmen, and two Mexicans, names unknown, were killed by the Indians, next before referred to, at Buckeye Bar, on Klamath River.

In September, 1855, Mrs. Clark and a young man were killed in Yam Hill County, by Coast Indians.

In September, 1855, Elisha Plummer and four others, names unknown, were killed at Grande Ronde, east of the Blue Mountains, by Cayuse and Walla Walla Indians.

In September, 1855, Indian Agent A. J. Bolen, —— Matteese, and two others, names unknown, were killed by the Yakima Indians, east of the Cascade Mountains.

On September 24, 1855, Fields and Cunningham were killed by Rogue River Indians, on the Siskiyou Mountains, between Jacksonville and Yreka.

On September 25, 1855, Samuel Warren, killed by the same Indians next above referred to.

October 9, 1855, Mrs. J. B. Wagoner, Mary Wagoner. Mr. and Mrs. Jones, Mr. and Mrs. Haines and two children, George W. Harris, David W. Harris, F. A. Reed, William Guin, James W. Cartwright, Mr. Powell, Bunch, Fox, Hamilton, and White, were killed by Umpqua and Rogue River Indians near Evan's Ferry, on Rogue River. This is known as the "Wagoner massacre."

Since 1851 upward of one hundred and fifty citizens have been murdered by the Indians of Southern Oregon and their immediate allies; and about fifty by the Indians of Northern Oregon and their allies since 1851. (Indorsed:) The report of the Committee on Military Affairs.
Adopted by the council February 3, 1858.

Resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Oregon, That the secretary of the Territory be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit copies of his excellency the governor's communication of the 18th of December last, and the accompanying documents, and copies of this resolution, to His Excellency James Buchanan, President of the United States, and to Hon. John B. Floyd, Secretary of War; also to send copies of the same to Hon. Joseph Lane, Delegate in Congress from Oregon, and that he be requested to present the same to Congress, and urge an appropriation to pay the Oregon volunteers who were called into service for the protection of the emigrants in 1854, and all just and necessary expenses.

Adopted in the council February 3, 1858.

H. D. O'BRYANT,
President of the Council.

Adopted in the House February 3, 1858.

IRA F. M. BUTLER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

February 18, 1863, General Alvord, in a report, says among other things:

I am also informed that General Wright has been authorized to establish a military post in the Klamath Lake country.

Again, February 26, 1863, in reply to a letter from department headquarters, asking his opinion, he says:

I am convinced that the step is a necessary one so as to protect the emigrant road and the frontier settlements. The Klamath and Modoc Indians, about twelve hundred souls, inhabit this country. The proposed new post would be upon the emigrant road from the Missouri, via South Pass and Humboldt River and Goose Lake, to Southern Oregon. Many emigrants at different dates have been murdered on that road.

And February 20, 1863, Major C. S. Drew, First Cavalry, Oregon Volunteers, writing from Camp Baker, Oregon, in reply to General Alvord, gives reasons why a military post should be established in the Klamath Basin, and reports in detail acts of Indian hostility committed near there since 1846, and states positively that one hundred and fifty-one white persons had been murdered, and about three hundred others, more or less, seriously wounded.

The term "Snake" applies to several bands or tribes of Indians, and includes the Bannocks, Winnas, Shoshones, Klamaths, and Modocs. They number in all about five thousand, some fifteen hundred of whom probably live in Idaho.

Mr. Huntington, superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, in his report to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, June 1, 1863, in referring to these bands, says:

> Their intercourse with the whites has been limited and hostile. The recent discoveries of gold brought crowds of miners to the rich soils of the Snake, Boise, and Malheur Rivers. Their labors have been constantly interrupted by the attacks of these Indians, and by depredations upon their property.

March 20, 1866, General Steele, in his report to the Military Division of the Pacific, says:

> Snakes and renegade Indians of Southeastern Oregon and Idaho have commenced depredations, with signs of continued hostilities to the whites.

And again, April 6, 1866, he says:

> There are five roads diverging from Goose Lake Valley, which lead into other valleys, that are inhabited or frequented by hostile Indians.

November 11, 1866, Lindsay Applegate, United States Indian subagent to Captain Sprague, commanding Fort Klamath, wrote that the Snakes had made a raid into the Modoc country near Goose Lake.

September 30, 1866, Captain Sprague reports in camp, near his post at Fort Klamath, a large number of Snakes gathered from Summer and Silver Lakes, and says:

> These Indians have certainly broken the treaty made with Mr. Huntington and now ratified, and Pau-ne-na, their chief, is now in open hostility.

General Crook, in his report of March 4, 1869, referring to the Indians who surrendered to him at Camp Harney, says:

> Among these Indians are many very crafty men, who may become troublesome again.

And again, in his report of May 8, 1869, General Crook, than whom no man has a better knowledge of Oregon Indians or of the proper method of dealing with them, says:

> There are large numbers of discontented and hostile Indians among the Eastern Oregon tribes.

I have thus referred with some degree of particularity, Mr. President, to these matters of history, for the purpose of giving some idea of the trials and sufferings through which our people have passed, and although the half has not been told, comment is unnecessary. It is a history of suffering and of pain, not upon the part of the Indians but of the whites, that carries within its crimson pages its own sad commentary. No power on earth can call to life the murdered Canby and Thomas. No legislative enactment can bring again to the family fireside the murdered husbands of Mrs. Body, Mrs. Brotherton, and others, slain on their own premises by Modoc savages. No legislation can now be had perhaps with propriety to restore to the cheated judiciary of Oregon the right which, in my judgment, legitimately and justly belonged to it, of arresting, arraigning, trying, convicting, and executing these men, who in cold blood and all unprovoked murdered some twenty of our citizens during the past eighteen months, and robbed their wives and children of their substance. No civil enactment or military order can now be had that can, by relation, go back and give us protection against wrongs already committed. Therefore we seek that just compensation to our injured citizens which rightfully accrues to them by reason of a failure upon the part of the Government to give proper and necessary protection; a compensation which at best is indeed but a sorry recompense for sufferings endured and losses sustained. Can it be claimed with any degree of propriety that our Government would be less diligent in giving protection to the lives, liberties, and property of its own citizens than of those of a foreign country? Most certainly not.

In this connection I desire to attract the attention of the Senate to a part of the eleventh article of the treaty of February 2, 1848, between the United States and Mexico, known as the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo. I will read it:

> Considering that a great part of the territories which by the present treaty are to be comprehended for the future within the limits of the United States is now occupied by savage tribes, who will hereafter be under the exclusive control of the Government of the United States, and whose incursions within the territory of Mexico would be prejudicial in the extreme, it is solemnly agreed that all such incursions shall be forcibly restrained by the Government of the United States whensoever this may be necessary; and that, when they cannot be prevented, they shall be punished by the said Government, and satisfaction for the same shall be exacted—all in the same way and with equal diligence and energy as if such incursion were meditated or committed within its own territory against its own citizens.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that our Government ever intended by this article to concede greater protection to the citizens of the United Mexican States against Indian depredations, or to pledge its faith in any stronger terms to those citizens to make satisfaction for and on account of such depredations, than it is willing to do or has done in reference to our own citizens. Upon the contrary, I cannot construe this solemn act of our Government to convey any other meaning or intention upon its part than simply this:

First. That all Indians, including all savage as well as all peaceable tribes within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, are, in the language of this treaty, "under the exclusive control of the Government of the United States;"

Secondly. That, this being so, it is the duty of the Government to "forcibly restrain" all incursions by any of these tribes or bands made against our own citizens, and that, in the language of this treaty, "when they cannot be prevented," then they shall be punished and satisfaction made; and

Thirdly. That by virtue of this treaty the Government of the United States covenants with the republic of Mexico that it will give to her citizens the same protection against Indian incursions and make the same satisfaction as it does in reference to our own citizens, as the treaty declares, "all in the same way and with equal diligence and energy as if such incursion were meditated or committed within its own territory against its own citizens."

But precedents are neither wanting nor few in reference to this subject, and what this Government has done before as an act of simple justice to its citizens it will not, I take it, hesitate to do again under a similar state of facts. It is but a few years, as the venerable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] will bear witness, since by a special enactment similar to that now claimed by the pending resolution claims to the extent of about $1,000,000 were ascertained and finally paid by the General Government to citizens of the State of Minnesota on account of losses sustained by reason of Indian depredations. I would inquire of the Senator from Minnesota if this is not the fact.

Mr. RAMSEY. I do not now remember the amount; but it was a considerable sum.

Mr. MITCHELL. The duty of the Government to protect the citizens of the State of Minnesota at their homes and on their farms against the depredations of savages in their enjoyment of life and property was in that instance very fully and rightfully recognized. Because the Government had failed to give this protection it felt bound, by duty, precedent, and equity, to ascertain in a proper manner the losses sustained, and then to make reasonable and just compensation, which was done.

Mr. President, may not the citizens of the State of Oregon ask as much? Or must their appeals for justice, by reason of the great distance from which they come, be lost on the desert air of the intervening wastes and never reach the ear of the Republic?

As one of her representatives upon this floor, and I may say the entire delegation from Oregon are, as I believe, agreed in reference to this matter, I have felt it my duty to detain the Senate at this time with these remarks, not only in vindication of our people with reference to their treatment of the Indian, but also with reference to the justice of their claims against the Government on account of the Indian. I desire to say that the people of Oregon are not opposed to any policy that has for its purpose the elevation of the Indian, or which will have a tendency to civilize and christianize that race. Upon the contrary, such a policy in reference to any race is in full harmony with the advanced civilization and Christian spirit of the age in which we live, and must commend itself to the favorable consideration of the better judgment and enlightened conscience of every intelligent, patriotic man. To this, therefore, they do not object; but when in the administration of this policy its agents and missionaries become so enthusiastic and fanatical as to be wholly unable to comprehend the fact that the Indian, yet enshrouded as he is amid the gloom of superstition and barbarism, is in the very nature of things prone to engage in acts of barbarism unless restrained by physical as well as moral power; when they deem it necessary to the success of a pet policy that the blame of every Indian depredation must be attributed to wrongful acts of the whites, and when, furthermore, without ever having resided in an Indian country, and therefore necessarily to a very great extent uninformed as to the real character, habits, and peculiarities of the Indian race, they persist in setting up their judgment in opposition to that of men who for over a quarter of a century have resided in the Indian country, and whose means of knowledge are necessarily of a superior nature, they do object to such an administration of a policy that might under a different régime be crowned with abundant success.

Give us honest, capable Indian agents, men whose qualifications are not to be determined by the fact that they are members of this church or that church. Let them be selected from the people, with reference to their knowledge of Indian affairs, and their experience in such matters—men who will do justice both to the Indian and the white man—and we will have a greater degree of prosperity both of the Indians and the whites.

I beg pardon for having detained the Senate so long, and now move a reference of the pending resolution to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 367) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the State authorities of Rhode Island a certain gun, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 43) authorizing a special court of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. GORDON. I move that the motion to reconsider the bill (S. No. 133) to relieve Thomas Hardeman, jr., of Georgia, and William L. Cabell, of Texas, of their political disabilities, entered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with an accompanying paper, which I now ask leave to present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to that being referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that the only way to accomplish the purpose would be to agree to the motion to reconsider and then refer the bill. The motion to reconsider cannot be referred to a committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then let the bill be reconsidered for the time being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question on reconsidering the vote on the passage of the bill; and that being agreed to, then the bill can be referred.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that some reason should be given for the reconsideration, in order that we may vote intelligently upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The only point was that the question about relieving one or both of these gentlemen was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and without any report of the committee the bill was put on its passage one day in some way, and I entered a motion to reconsider, in order that we could inquire into the propriety of it. Since then, Senators having the matter in charge have furnished some documents which they desire should go back to the Committee on the Judiciary with the bill for consideration.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia now moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ALCORN presented the credentials of Hon. H. R. PEASE, chosen by the Legislature of Mississippi Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. Adelbert Ames.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. PEASE, he took his seat in the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 668) relative to private contracts or agreements made with the Indians prior to May 21, 1872—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 1929) to secure a more efficient administration of Indian affairs—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 1930) to secure to the Episcopal Board of Missions the land in the White Earth Indian reservation, in Minnesota, on which are situated their church and other buildings—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 912) to provide for the inspection of the disbursements of appropriations made by officers of the Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 1931) to authorize the sale of the military reservation of Fort Reynolds, in Colorado Territory, and the Government buildings thereon—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RHODE ISLAND BATTERY GUN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 367) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the State authorities of Rhode Island a certain gun, which was, in line 7, after the word "light," to strike out the word "infantry," and insert in lieu thereof the word "artillery."

Mr. ANTHONY. That is merely a verbal correction, and I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MERRIMON, to amend the bill in section 3, line 12, by striking out "25" and inserting "75;" so as to read:

Provided, That the whole amount of circulation issued to such banking associations, and withdrawn and redeemed from banking associations under the provisions of this act, shall not exceed $75,000,000.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I understand that the amendment now before the Senate is the one proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] allowing a withdrawal of circulation from the States having a larger amount than their proportion up to the sum of $75,000,000. I will not go extensively into the questions of finance, for I am sure they have been fully debated by this body since the subject has been under consideration; but I will endeavor to confine myself as closely as possible to the merits, if it has merits, of the pending amendment.

I fully agree with some suggestions which have been made by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] and also by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] that there is an apparent, and perhaps a real, injustice done some of the Western and Southern States, because they do not have their proper proportion, as it is called, of bank-note circulation. I do not know that I should agree to the term "injustice;" but let us call it "injustice" for the present. I submit that if these States are now suffering unjustly, it is not just to relieve that injustice by inflicting injustice upon another section of the country. It is not necessary. Relief can be secured in some other way.

The injustice arises from an attempt to make a distribution of currency by law, when it can be equitably distributed only by the demands of internal commerce. The fault is not in New England, not in States that have a circulation larger than what is called their proportion, but in the law which defines the apportionment.

What we need is freedom, deliverance from unnecessary restriction imposed by statute law. This can be secured by free banking. Free banking, under wise and just laws, will give to the West and South all the banking facilities which they will require or can profitably use. This bill proposes no such remedy; but, on the contrary, demands a new distribution of bank capital and bank-note circulation to-day, to be repeated to-morrow for the same reason which demands it to-day.

The honorable Senator from Michigan now in the chair, [Mr. FERRY,] expressed a wish that as New England had availed herself of benefits derived from a surplus of capital, she would be considerate and remember that the West had furnished more than her quota of men to suppress the rebellion. I would not pluck a laurel from the brow of any western man or from any State; but I am not willing to allow that New England was dilatory or deficient in furnishing men to sustain the Government. Every one knows that "Connecticut is a good State to emigrate from," and that the Western States have made heavy drafts upon our young arms-bearing men, and left us with an undue proportion of women and of men too old for military service; and yet I would say that Connecticut sent the first regiments to the front which were armed, equipped, uniformed, and furnished with a baggage-train complete for field service. Besides, Connecticut furnished during the rebellion 12½ per cent. of able-bodied men more than the quota assigned her by the War Department; and there was but one brief period when the State was deficient in her quota.

These are not reasons why the West, proud of her strength, should do an act of injustice to New England. These facts also show that the argument upon which the Senator from Michigan asks consideration is not properly based. There are reasons why New England should regard the interests of the West, but they were not named in this part of the speech of the honorable Senator.

But Connecticut not only furnished more than her quota of men, but her banks, organized under State laws, at the first news of the attack on Sumter, on the first day tendered to the Executive nearly $1,000,000 to be used at his discretion to maintain national authority. And soon after this, at the mere suggestion of the Executive, the State banks took $2,000,000 of State bonds at par, every dollar of which was expended in arming and equipping her volunteers, when they could have taken national bonds at ninety cents on the dollar.

It was after this that they were induced by the "pitchfork argument" to abandon State protection and all the rights and privileges that they had enjoyed under State laws, and organize under the national banking law. In doing this they had confidence that if they should thus render such aid as the Government required they would be protected in the enjoyment of such benefits as the law then offered. The great and distinguishing benefit proffered was the benefit which might arise from circulation. And now, because some sections of the country have not equal benefits, you propose to take from banks in the East the very privileges which you offered as an inducement for them to furnish the Government with the sinews of war.

If some sections of the country are suffering unjustly, you propose to remedy the evil by inflicting like injury upon another section. This is to be done by a redistribution of your currency. But let me assure you that this is injustice and will be no remedy; because you cannot make an equitable distribution, unless you can make a correct estimate of the business of the country, and of its local business in every part.

But suppose you could do exact justice by such a distribution to-day, it would not be equitable to-morrow. There will be a clamor for a new distribution, and that will be renewed at every change in the current of business which sweeps rapidly over every section of the country. There will be continually an interference with that adjustment and with that crystallization of capital and labor which stimulates the greatest variety of business pursuits, and by which the products of our industry reach their maximum value. An interference with this adjustment will not only be injurious to local interests, but to national prosperity.

Should we not then try some other remedy for the evils under which the West and South are suffering? Rather than violate plighted faith or clearly implied obligations, will it not be more satisfactory to every section of the country to open the present banking law so as to allow every association of men to organize a bank at such place and with such capital as they shall elect, restrained only by requiring positive redemption.

But if you must take from the East in order to conciliate the West, or in order to do justice to that section of the country, do not strike too heavy a blow at first. If we must bleed, open a vein, and not an artery; take not the $75,000,000, as proposed by the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, but be content with the $25,000,000 proposed by the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of making any extended remarks, either upon this bill or upon the general subject of finance; but I do desire to say a few words upon the amendment now pending, that my position may not be misunderstood as a member of the Committee on Finance, either with regard to this bill or upon the general subject, on which, perhaps, I may have somewhat more to say when it shall again be before us.

The bill, as reported from the Committee on Finance, is intended simply to make effective the provisions of the act of 1870 for the redistribution of what was then determined to be a proper amount to be withdrawn from the States which had an excess of national-bank circulation, and to be given to those in which there was a deficiency. It will be remembered that when the Comptroller of the Currency approached the period when he was expected to carry the act of 1870 into effect, he incorporated into his annual report the opinion that it was impracticable, and for that reason recommended the repeal of the sixth section of the act of 1870. If that recommendation had been acted upon by the Finance Committee before the panic of 1873, then I have no doubt the States for whose benefit the sixth section was intended would have resisted its repeal and demanded that which they now hesitate to receive. We come now, however, in the light of the experience which this financial revulsion has given us, to consider the question of justice and expediency in carrying out the provisions of that law, and the Finance Committee is endeavoring simply to remove what seems to be a technical obstacle in the mind of the Comptroller to giving it practical effect. That is done by declaring—for this is the effect of the bill—that the words "taken up," in the act of 1870, do not mean that the bank circulation down to the last dollar authorized to be redistributed shall actually be issued, but that, because there are applications pending which will take up the whole of it, he shall now proceed to carry the law into effect. That bill I will vote for.

But the Senator from North Carolina has offered an amendment which proposes to increase the amount of currency to be distributed by the Comptroller from twenty-five millions to seventy-five millions; and the plain English of that proposition is an increase of national-bank circulation by the amount of $50,000,000. That I will not vote for; not because I am not favorable to giving banking facilities to all parts of the country. I desire that they shall have them. I vote for this bill, not because I am a believer in the theory of fixing a per capita circulation, not because I believe that money taken by a bank and put in circulation in a neighborhood will remain there without regard to its business, for I think our western friends have almost themselves answered that allegation when they make a complaint on this floor that they have too little money in the West, and that they cannot keep even the little that they have from flowing to the East. I vote for it because these localities, which would establish national banks, are entitled to their banking facilities; but I shall vote against the pending amendment because, with my present views, I am opposed altogether to increasing the national-bank circulation.

I may have some figures hereafter to present on that question; but I do not wish to take up time unnecessarily on a subject which is not legitimately before us. I think it is time that some of the delusions connected with the national-bank system should be swept away, and that it should be presented to the people exactly in the form in which it practically operates. The idea that the stockholders are receiving as clear profit 5 and 6 per cent. annually on their bonds, when the State and national governments get as taxes annually 4½ per cent. out of the 5 or 6, should be swept away at once; and I think when we come to consider that subject it can be demonstrated that every dollar of national-bank currency could be withdrawn and the whole volume of that and of the legal-tender currency now issued could be based upon United States bonds bearing 2 per cent. interest, with less expense to the Government in the shape of interest than is now paid on the $354,000,000 of national-bank circulation.

I desire to see not only the national-bank currency withdrawn; I desire not only to see the Government relieved from the business of banking which it is proposed it shall embark in by some propositions; but I desire also to see abolished distinctions existing in appearance between national-bank circulation founded upon the faith of the Government and legal-tender notes founded upon the same faith. I wish to see every dollar that is in circulation, with the impress of the Government upon it, declare upon its face that it is a dollar founded on the faith of the Government, issued through the banks, redeemable primarily in gold or bonds by the banks, who can regulate that business, and, upon their default, ultimately by the Government. Of the details for accomplishing this I do not propose now to speak. But, sir, while I am making this declaration, I do not wish it to be understood that I shall advocate an unlimited issue of irredeemable paper money. While I agree that the people ought to be furnished by the Government with currency enough to meet the current needs of business, I also, if I have learned anything in my reading of history, have learned that an irredeemable paper currency, unlimited in quantity by proper provisions for redemption, is the parent of wild and reckless speculation, of defalcations, of demoralization, and ultimate losses to all classes in the business affairs of any country in which such a currency is permitted to circulate.

Because then, Mr. President, I am unwilling at the present time to increase the volume of national-bank circulation, not because I am not willing to give banking facilities to the regions of country which are now deprived of them, I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, and shall await the time when we shall have some practical measure before us reported by the Finance Committee, intended, in the language of the resolution which they have reported, to enable us to redeem our faith plighted by the act of 1869, and to furnish a currency uniform and permanent in its value, and so adjusted as to meet the recurring wants of business. Reserving what I shall have to say until that time, I have risen more for the purpose of giving my reason for voting against this amendment, that I may not be misunderstood, than for the purpose of entering into any general discussion upon the financial question.

I do not think that the distribution of the twenty-five million to the West and to the South will effect the purpose which some of its advocates several years ago contended it would. I do not believe that you can fix any per capita circulation which will furnish the necessary currency to do the business of any one country by citing and examining the per capita circulation which is given in another. The amount of business, its nature, the amount of money which is needed in supplying the daily wants of men, the question of whether they are engaged in agricultural pursuits, mining pursuits, manufacturing pursuits, all requiring different amounts of circulation; the habits of the people, their use or distrust of banking facilities, all have to be considered in determining the amount of per capita circulation that is necessary. Looking at the tables which are incorporated in the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, we find that when bank circulation was unlimited, when the State banks were permitted to issue bank-notes ad libitum almost, the per capita circulation in the States which now have very little, had very little then, and that the States which have a large per capita circulation now had the largest per capita circulation then. This is true of Rhode Island, true of Connecticut, true of Massachusetts. Why, sir, in looking at the figures for the State represented by the present occupant of the chair, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan,) I remember that in the tables given as to the circulation in 1862 they had not twenty cents per capita, and now they have many times that, even under the faulty distribution of national-bank circulation. The same was true in reference to the State of Illinois. With $619,000 circulation, I think, in the year 1862, they had not more, perhaps, than thirty-six cents per capita, whereas now, if I recollect aright, they have over seven dollars per capita.

The per capita circulation, as among the States which have large earnings laid by—capital in its true sense—and those States which are young, whose populations have yet in a large measure their money to make, their farms to pay for, their debts to wipe out, these proportions of per capita circulation have kept pace with the development of the States from 1862, when these tables were published, down to the present time.

I vote for this bill not because I believe in this theory of fixing a per capita circulation, or that you can fasten and keep money in Illinois by putting a bank there, but for the purpose of doing that justice which was intended by the law in giving the various sections of the country their banking facilities and carrying out that law enacted to remedy what was clamored against as an injustice at that time. When it assumes any new features, which may interfere with the general adjustment to which I look forward, or prevent the preparatory steps for that uniformity in our circulation which I think desirable, I will not feel bound to support it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two on the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from North Carolina. I do not object to the spirit of his amendment, but I think the form of it may be objectionable. I am well satisfied that if we desire to do so we can withdraw every dollar of circulation from every national bank in the country. It is no act of bad faith, as indicated by the Senator from Vermont yesterday, to withdraw the circulation from these banks. In every law that we have passed on this subject we have reserved the right to alter, amend, or repeal it. I think there is a want of equity, however, in taking seventy-five millions of the circulation from one section of the country and placing it in another section. If we withdraw bank circulation from existing banks, it seems to me that we ought to do so from all the existing banks, especially for any amount of withdrawal over and above the twenty-five millions involved in this bill as reported, this latter sum being fixed as the probable excess of circulation taken up by the eastern banks.

The objection to-day in every portion of this country to the national banking law is to the monopoly feature of it; that a certain set of gentlemen in every State, having organized under the banking law, have a monopoly of the national-bank circulation. If we wish to equalize this circulation, and if it is a benefit to any bank to have it, we have a perfect right to withdraw from any one of these banks, and from all of them, 5, 10, or 15 per cent., and give it to new banks that may desire to organize under the banking act.

But I concede that there are some equities in favor of the New England banks, even against the bill proposed by the Committee on Finance. They were virtually forced into our national banking system by the laws that we made here. Under the original act, in 1863, provision was made for a distribution of the circulation among the States, one-half on the basis of population and one-half on the basis of wealth, industry, and existing bank capital.

In 1864 that mode of distribution of circulation was entirely removed, and was removed with a view to induce the State banks all over the country to embrace this national system; and soon after the passage of that amendatory act of 1864 we taxed the State banks out of existence; we said to them, "You must go into this national system or lose circulation entirely." We taxed State banks by the act of March 3, 1865, 10 per cent. upon their circulation. For what purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to suggest that on that same day, March 3, 1865, we restored the old law of distribution?

Mr. ALLISON. I remember that very well. It is true the old provision for a distribution according to population and wealth was restored by the act passed on the same day; but we invited the then existing State banks to organize under our national system by saying to them, "If you do not do so, if you do not invest your capital in United States bonds, we will tax you 10 per cent. on your State circulation." Therefore we forced by our laws every State bank out of existence or into the national system; and now we say to the capital of the country that seeks investment in banking, "You shall not invest in national banks, because the limit of circulation is $354,000,000." That is, we make an arbitrary limit. Who is there that can say that $354,000,000 is just the amount of national-bank circulation that we ought to have, no more and no less?

When the bill of 1870, which provided for an additional issue of $54,000,000 to take up the 3 per cent. certificates and for a redistribution of $25,000,000 of existing circulation, was reported from the Banking and Currency Committee in the House, it provided for $95,000,000 additional circulation; and being under discussion in the House, some one inquired why the limit of $95,000,000 was fixed. No very satisfactory answer could be given. But a facetious member then in the House from Kentucky undertook to give a satisfactory answer by stating that it was ninety-five million miles to the sun, and the committee proposed a dollar a mile. [Laughter.] I submit no better reason can be given for limiting the present circulation to $354,000,000, and no more, than was given by the member then from Kentucky for the bill providing for $95,000,000. Twenty millions more added to the bank circulation of the country and to the banking capital of the country would make no appreciable change in existing values one way or the other.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance tells us that if this bill, authorizing the taking away from the old States and placing in the new States this twenty-five millions of circulation, is passed it will be two years before the twenty-five millions will be taken up or wanted in the new States now without their quota. I believe he is substantially correct in that statement. I do not believe that this bank circulation would be taken up rapidly. No bank can organize under the existing banking law without substantially putting up $1.30 in money for each ninety cents of circulation it receives. Every national bank that is organized must buy United States bonds at their present advanced price, and it receives only 90 per cent. in circulation of the face of the bonds; and in addition to that it must keep as a reserve, in its vaults or elsewhere, 15 per cent. of that circulation, and must in addition pay heavy local taxes, municipal, county, and State, as well as the taxes now imposed by our revenue laws.

Now we are called upon to take away from the Eastern States only this $75,000,000 of circulation. I submit that it is hardly fair to the banks which have been organized under the inducement of our laws to do that. I do not favor any inflation of the currency, but I believe it would be better to authorize still further bank circulation to the extent of the twenty-five millions now proposed to be redistributed, or even more, than to disturb bank capital and circulation in the older States. We have reached a period in the session, I think, when it is fair and proper that we should discuss every question connected with the national banks. I believe we should at the earliest moment provide for all the changes we propose to make at this session in our laws respecting the currency, so that all classes and sections of our country may know what the policy of Congress is to be, in order that they may arrange their affairs in harmony with that policy.

If it should take two years to redistribute this $25,000,000 it would also take two years to issue $25,000,000 of new bank circulation. Such moderate increase of bank paper, properly distributed, the distribution requiring two years, can in no sense be called inflation. Why, we have increased the volume of greenbacks more than this sum in three months. But if that increase is impossible, then I am for the spirit of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, which, as I understand it, is that the existing national banks, whether they be East or West, whether the particular section where they are has its full quota or not, shall return to the Comptroller of the Currency a percentage of their present bank circulation, and that that percentage shall be given to any new bank in any portion of the country that seeks to organize itself, giving preference to the West and South, where there is now a deficiency. It seems to me that we ought to remove, if we can, this restrictive clause in this matter of the circulation of the national banks. If we cannot do it by enlarging the circulation, let us do it by diffusing it. Mr. President, I hope that the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina will be so modified as to take the additional $50,000,000, if so much be required, from all the existing national banks, and not from that portion of the country only which now has an excess of circulation, amounting, as stated, in the aggregate to twenty-five millions.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, in offering the amendment to the pending bill to strike out "twenty-five millions," and insert "seventy-five millions" instead thereof, I was not moved by any hostility toward the Eastern States. If they have wealth and industry and enterprise, I rejoice at the fact; and when they prosper I believe the whole country prospers in some measure. But, while I rejoice at their prosperity and their advantages, especially in monetary matters, I desire to see such advantages extended to the whole country, and especially to that section of it which I have the honor in part to represent. So that I beg the Senate to understand that nothing is further from my purpose than to do any act necessarily hostile to the Eastern States.

Now, I propose to examine very briefly the circumstances underlying the amendment which I offered and see whether there is in it in any sense injustice. If I could be convinced of any such wrong, I am very sure I should be the first to recede from the position which I occupy. The amendment is predicated upon the notion that the country by statutory limitations is to have a volume of bank circulation equal to three hundred and fifty-four millions, and no more. Other gentlemen and myself have had occasion to say during the discussion in the Senate in reference to the finances of the country that we believe there is not sufficient currency in the country to effectuate the exchanges according to the due and ordinary course of business. Those gentlemen who are opposed to what they style "inflation" say that the volume is sufficient, and they tell the Senate and they tell the country in plain and peremptory terms that the volume of currency is quite sufficient and it shall not be increased, but that, on the contrary, they propose to contract it and to hurry the country into specie payments. While I am in favor of returning to specie payments, and as strongly so as any Senator present, I take into consideration the circumstances and condition of the country; and my judgment is that we cannot promptly return to such payments, that it requires time to do it, and I am as well satisfied that in the mean time the country ought to have relief by some measure of expansion. But, as I said, this amendment is offered in view of the limited bank circulation authorized by the statute, and only in that view.

If banking were free, or if Congress would allow the volume of currency to be increased to such sum as, in my judgment, would subserve the interests of the country, I should be willing to yield the point that I contend for now, but under no other circumstances whatsoever; and even then I believe that this concentration of monetary capital in the Eastern States, for reasons that I may advert to on some future occasion, tends to the general injury of the whole country.

Now let us see how much injustice there is in the proposition embodied in my amendment. By the law as it now stands the volume of bank circulation is limited to $354,000,000. By the law as it has stood from 1865 down to this moment, that bank circulation thus limited was to be distributed over the Union according to population and wealth. The statute so provided in express and peremptory terms. Yet what do we see? We see that instead of the distribution provided by the statute, commanded by the statute, the Eastern States, mainly the New England States, have in excess of the distribution allowed to them by law over $80,000,000 of the $354,000,000 composing the whole volume.

What is the result of that tremendous excess? The result is that the monetary capital of the country, and all the influences and advantages growing out of it, are concentrated in that section of the Union, comparatively a small section, while the vast West, while the slowly reviving South, are deprived of those monetary conveniences, of that volume of circulation, of those advantages that grow out of a sufficient money circulation, and all this because it is thus concentrated in the East. It seems to me that the naked statement of the facts is sufficient to show that it is not just. Surely no one can seriously contend that it is right, just, proper, and wise that this excess of $80,000,000 should be concentrated in that little locality at the expense or those vast sections of the country which are not supplied because of such concentration.

Now, why do they say that it is unjust? Some gentleman suggests that New England rendered valuable service during the late civil war, and that they were active in putting this new banking, which was forced upon them, into practical operation. Well, sir, they are entitled to due credit for that. But let us see what were the terms upon which they did so, and what they got for what they did. In the first place, the law prescribed in terms that if they took this excess they took it with the express understanding that when the necessities and convenience of other sections of the country demanded it they should return it to be redistributed. That was the contract that they made understandingly with the Government at the time they took this excess in violation of law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator please point out to us where the violation of law is?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will do it with a great deal of pleasure. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday evening, in responding to a similar question propounded to him by my honorable friend from Vermont, answered it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The honorable Senator from Ohio, I am sorry to say, only quoted one half the statute. There happened to be two statutes of the 3d of March, 1865, instead of one, and the honorable Senator from Ohio quoted one and accidentally omitted the other, which provides for quite a different thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator makes a great mistake.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not mean to say that my friend intended to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I stated distinctly that there were two laws, and that the difficulty arose out of different constructions of those laws. I do not like to have my motives aspersed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not asperse the Senator's motives; far from it; I do not know that he has any motive. I only appeal to the RECORD and read what the Senator said:

> Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Vermont seems to leave the impression on the Senate that by the act of June 3, 1864, the limitation of law requiring an apportionment of this currency was repealed; but he forgot to read the act of March 3, 1865, which restored it.

That, I hope, was not an imputation on my motives; and certainly I do not impugn my friend's motives.

> At the time of the passage of the act of March 3, 1865, the whole amount of national banks organized in the United States was about $100,000,000. From the act of March 3, 1865, I will read the clause providing for apportionment:
> "And that $150,000,000 of the entire amount of circulating notes authorized to be issued shall be apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, according to representative population, and the remainder shall be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury among associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of such State, District, and Territory."
> Every one of the banks organized in States in excess of their proportion was organized after this act was passed and in defiance of the act.

Now let me read further to the Senator from Ohio and to the Senate another act reported, I believe, by himself from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon. The act was reported by the committee; not that particular clause, which was moved by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] as an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The act was reported. I certainly agree with the Senator from Ohio in his main sentiment, and have no disposition to misrepresent him. I beg him to understand that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish the Senator would state the facts in this matter. That is all I ask.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. I do not desire to misstate any facts. It was exactly for the purpose of preventing a misstatement of facts that I rose. I concur entirely therefore with the Senator from Ohio in the propriety of my going on.

Section 7 of the act of March 3, 1865, being entitled "An act to amend 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' approved June 30, 1864," is as follows:

> And be it further enacted, That any existing bank organized under the laws of any State, having a paid-up capital of not less than $75,000, which shall apply before the 1st day of July next for authority to become a national bank under the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and shall comply with all the requirements of said act, shall, if such bank be found by the Comptroller of the Currency to be in good standing and credit, receive such authority in preference to new associations applying for the same: Provided, That it shall be lawful for any bank or banking association organized under State laws, and having branches, the capital being joint and assigned to and used by the mother bank and branches in definite proportions, to become a national banking association in conformity with existing laws, and to retain and keep in operation its branches, or such one or more of them as it may elect to retain; the amount of the circulation redeemable at the mother bank and each branch to be regulated by the amount of capital assigned to and used by each.

I think that does not quite accord with the act which the Senator from Ohio read yesterday, and upon which he asserted, without referring to this statute which I have now read, that "every one of the banks organized in States in excess of their proportion was organized after this act was passed, and in defiance of the act."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot yield at this moment. My friend must excuse me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio will state his question of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a right to insist that the Senator shall not misstate my position; and I say that when he says I did not refer to the act he has just read he misstates my position, because in response to the inquiry put to me directly I referred to the two acts in so many words. I do not desire to have my position misstated, especially as the Senator is so captious about inquiring as to my motives; and, if he will allow me, I will read what I said, to show that I am correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only allow what the Chair regards as a point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit this to show to the Senate that the Senator misstates a point of fact. I will now read——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont makes the point that the Chair must rule on the point of order. The Senator from Ohio will state his point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I state that I have the right to correct a misstatement of my position by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that to depend on the courtesy of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "The courtesy of the Senate!" We are standing on our rules now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will waive it for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and recognizes the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, I yield with the greatest pleasure to my friend from Ohio to make his statement, for I certainly do not design to do him injustice.

Mr. SHERMAN. I stand on my rights, and will make the correction after awhile.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly correct. We both have our rights now. [Laughter.] I shall have the pleasure of reading (which is almost the best reading I know of) the statement of the honorable Senator from Ohio, even three or four times, because I wish the Senator to drink it in to the very bottom. I repeat, Mr. President, with all deference to the honorable Senator from Ohio, who seems to have got himself, I will not say into a passion, because that is not a senatorial thing—no Senator can be in a passion—but to have got himself into one of those states that frequently befall men who are mixed up on finance, feeling a little restive about having a part of his own speech read to him. Well, Mr. President, I confess I have a profound sympathy with that. If anybody were to read any of my speeches on finance in my presence, I am sure that I should feel restive enough to leave at once. I admit that. All that I have done to the honorable Senator so far is to read what he said himself. Now, the honorable Senator intimates that that is not fair and that it misstates his position. It is true, as I would have stated if the honorable Senator had given me leave to proceed, and had not—I will not say under pretense of a point of order, because that would not be just to him—but under the cover of a point of order, undertaken to say something that he did state a day or two ago in another part or his remarks, in reply to another question, put by somebody else, that there were two acts of 1865. So there were. The honorable Senator said that; but he did not then say, if he will pardon me for calling his attention to the fact, to the best of my recollection, though I have not read his remarks on that point, that these two acts taken together made the issue of this money to the State banks transformed into national banks a perfectly lawful and regular one, and that the Secretary of the Treasury was not liable to impeachment in this body or anywhere else because in obedience to this provision of the act of March 3, 1865, he gave to the State banks that chose to turn over into national ones the amount of currency to which, by the law, they were entitled. It is perfectly useless to disguise this matter, if anybody desires to disguise it. The truth is that the provisions of the act of March 3, 1865, in one statute and those in the other must be read together, as every lawyer knows. The Senator from Ohio knows it. Reading them together you find that while there is to be this distribution according to population and according to business, as existed in the original act, I believe, and which was repealed by the act of 1864——

I must beg pardon of my friend from North Carolina for one minute more; I see he is uneasy.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am waiting for you to make your correction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Taking the two together, you then have the special provision that any State bank, of which there were hundreds over the country—thousands for aught I know—might change itself into a national bank independently of this limitation of population and business, and so on, and give up its own notes and take national notes for them. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has stated that this morning as well as it could be stated. Therefore I say—and that is all that I rose to say, and regretting that I have taken so much of the time of my friend from North Carolina, and apologizing to my friend from Ohio if I have unintentionally done him injustice, for I did not intend to do so—I say there is no good ground for asserting that this issue of circulation to the State banks that have transformed themselves into national banks was contrary to or in defiance of law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend from North Carolina will allow me to say a word in reply.

Mr. MERRIMON. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only reason that I showed any feeling about the matter was because I thought the sharp, incisive tone of the honorable Senator from Vermont was not exactly the thing here. In the first place, he rather impugned my motives I thought. When I corrected him in that, he said, "I did not do that; I did not know you had any motive." That was a sharp way of saying that I had no motive. I do not suppose the Senator means anything unkind, but it rasps a little to have these sharp, pungent remarks made. We all admit that he is very ingenious and quite incisive in his mode and manner; and sometimes we feel sensitive about it.

Now, I wish simply to say that I think I did the Senator exact justice, and I answered him with the most explicit bearing on this very point. It is true that under the act of 1863 the first national banking act, there was a limitation and a mode of distributing the national-bank circulation. The amount was limited to $300,000,000, of which $150,000,000 were to be divided according to population, and the other $150,000,000 according to wealth, production, &c. This clause was not in the law of 1865, and why? Because up to 1864 the amount of banks organized under the banking act had been very small indeed; I think only about $150,000,000. Only $60,000,000 of circulation had been issued up to November, 1864. I have the document before me showing it. Very little progress had been made in the organization of national banks, and this limitation was omitted. It was found after the passage of the act of 1864 that banks were rapidly organizing under it, especially the old banks, and then Congress after debate, in the act of March 3, 1865, which I read to the honorable Senator, restored in hæc verba the provision about distribution. But at the same session an amendment was offered by my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] which gave the existing State banks a preference over new banks. The construction of those two sections, when read together, in my judgment shows that it was the intention of Congress to restore the old limitation, the old rate of distribution; but that in the applications for the banking circulation under the act there was to be a preference given to the old banks rather than to new ones; and this apportionment would have given all the old banks in all the States I believe, perhaps with the exception of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, their share of bank circulation.

In order to show that when the Senator inquired of me about this matter I gave him the exact facts, I will read the inquiry he put to me:

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the question which I wished to ask the honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, was to be good enough to point out to the Senate where the law is which he says has been violated, or not obeyed, in the case of the banks of Rhode Island taking so much of the banking facilities of the country as they did at the time.

Now, here is my answer:

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is the act of March 3, 1865. There were two laws passed on the same day. I do not desire to go into a long explanation, but I can do so. There were two laws passed on the same day, one re-establishing the old principle of distribution and the other giving banks in existence a priority. The construction I have always put on these two acts, when taken together, was that the old banks should have a priority in the distribution of the part assigned to the State. It was the construction of those two laws that led to this unequal distribution.

And I have the laws before me. Now I ask the honorable Senator if that was not a frank answer to a frank question; whether he thought that in reading only one of the laws, I accidentally omitted reading the other?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator really wishes me to answer now, I certainly answer with entire frankness that neither then nor now do I intend to impute to the Senator any desire to conceal anything, because I know he has not any such desire. As to anything that I said that was "incisive," as he calls it, whatever that is, I wish to take it all back; but the Senator did say, and that was what my friend from North Carolina grounded his declaration upon to which I arose, that this proceeding under the act of March 3, 1865, had resulted in an illegal appropriation by these banks of money which did not belong to them, which would follow of course from an illegal act of the Secretary of the Treasury in letting them take it. I never heard it questioned at the time that, taking the two laws together, the action was legal. I do not say this in order to show that my friend's bill is not right, because certainly Congress has always reserved the power to readjust the currency whenever it pleases. I was only trying to defend the Secretary of the Treasury, and the banks which got more than it seems now to be thought they ought to have got, from the charge of having acted illegally or having violated the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now let me go a step further. After I had made this statement to the honorable Senator—there is only one page between them—he then proceeded to argue upon the omission of the apportionment clause from the act of 1864. He said that by the act of 1864 the previous apportionment was repealed, and there was no restoration of it; but he did not himself refer at all to the act of 1865. Then, at the conclusion of his remarks, when he had made no reference to either act of 1865, I reminded him that the rule of apportionment was restored by an act of March 3, 1865, having previously informed him that there were two acts passed on the same day upon which the difficulty about construction arose.

I will here state, for the information of my friend from North Carolina, who probably has not looked into the matter in detail so much, that up to March 3, 1865, there had been no violation of the rule of apportionment. Nearly all this rush of existing banks occurred after the war was over. There was no patriotism in the North or anywhere else in that regard until, I think, April or May, 1865, when the war closed. Up to that time no State had reached its just share of circulation under the apportionment. But the then Comptroller of the Currency, taking these two laws together, held that the one repealed the other. I believe subsequent Comptrollers have always taken a different view, have always acted upon the idea that they would give no bank a priority unless there was a balance due in the State not taken, and then the priority should apply to the bank.

I thank my friend from North Carolina for allowing me to make this explanation.

Mr. MORTON. With the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the provision in the act of 1865, relied upon by my friend from Vermont, does not cover this case at all, except to a very limited extent. That was in the nature of a special provision providing that banks with branches, which several States had, might come into the national banking system.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What section is my friend referring to?

Mr. MORTON. Section 7 of the act of 1865. That simply referred to States having banks with branches. We had a bank of that kind in Indiana; they had one in Ohio; and perhaps several other States had them; but it did not extend to the general banking system of the States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have not read the first part of the section.

Mr. MORTON. No; but that was only giving a preference; that was not making it absolute. The only absolute part is included in the proviso:

Provided, That it shall be lawful for any bank or banking association organized under State laws, and having branches, the capital being joint and assigned to and used by the mother-bank and branches in definite proportions, to become a national banking association in conformity with existing laws, and to retain and keep in operation its branches, or such one or more of them as it may elect to retain; the amount of the circulation redeemable at the mother-bank and each branch to be regulated by the amount of capital assigned to and used by each.

I remember the circumstances of the passage of that provision. It was intended more particularly, I think, to apply to two States, Ohio and Indiana; but it did not authorize or give any additional rights to joint-stock banks, independent banks, or free banks, as they were called, in the different States, but was intended to apply to banks with branches. I do not know how many States had banks of that kind, but I think only four or five.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I can appeal to the indulgence of the Senator from North Carolina for one moment more, I wish to do it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Indiana says that the only strength in the seventh section of the finance act of 1865, if it might be so called, the internal-revenue act, is in its proviso; that the chief part of the section has no application to the subject, and it is only the proviso that has any force at all. Now I wish to read again that part which is not the proviso, but which is the enacting part of the statute itself, for it would be rather a singular section which contained nothing in it but the proviso to what had gone before. Now hear what it declares, and I appeal to my friend from Indiana to hear it:

That any existing bank organized under the laws of any State, having a paid-up capital of not less than $75,000, which shall apply before the 1st day of July next for authority to become a national bank under the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and shall comply with all the requirements of said act—

That is the act of 1864, which had no limitation of this kind in it—shall, if such bank be found by the Comptroller of the Currency to be in good standing and credit, receive such authority in preference to new associations applying for the same.

That is not limited to any State lines; it is not limited to any question of branches; but it is limited to the fact that here is a corporation anywhere in the United States with a capital of $75,000, in good standing, which is invited to turn itself into a national bank by taking up its State circulation, buying United States bonds, and receiving United States notes. That is what it says in explicit terms. It is not open to interpretation; it speaks for itself. Then the act goes on to provide for the case where one bank might have several branches, and it might be doubtful under the chief part of the section whether those branches would also be entitled to this privilege and pre-emption, so to speak, that is given to the regular State banks. Then it went on to provide that those banks having branches also might come in under precisely the same terms, each one of those branches as well as the parent bank. So that I think an argument cannot be founded upon any part of this section 7 to show that banks that turned from State banks into national ones, as hundreds did, if the Senator will look at the reports at that time, were receiving money or circulation contrary to law.

Mr. MORTON. One word more, if my friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] will indulge me. My friend from Vermont was very much amused when he got up to reply to me, and I think he was under the impression that I had misapprehended the effect of the first part of that section. I have no doubt he was sincere in that impression. I will simply read the concluding part of what he read, to show his mistake:

Shall, if such bank be found by the Comptroller of the Currency to be in good standing and credit, receive such authority in preference to new associations applying for the same.

In other words, the old bank shall have the preference to the currency over the new association, in a case where otherwise the new association would have a right to the currency. That is the whole of it. There is nothing positive about it; but in a case where the new association under the law would have a right to the currency, an old bank coming in shall have the preference. It does not give the old bank the positive right to have the currency anyhow; but that right is given positively in the proviso to State banks having branches. They positively had the right under that act to come in and organize as national banks. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] suggests, what is very obvious, that if in a particular place the new bank has no right to circulation in a particular State that has no right to it, where the limit has been exhausted, there the old bank has no right to it; but where there are two associaticus applying, one of which is entitled, the old bank shall have it in preference to the new. That was a rightful provision. The only positive provision in favor of the old banks was in favor of banks having branches, of which I think there were but four or five in the United States.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I do not know that I have lost anything by stirring up this friendly little controversy between my friends. They have thrown some light on the point that I was endeavoring to make clear, and which was material for my purpose. I will now state, in view of the debate which has just transpired, that I think my honorable friend from Vermont is in error in his construction of the act which he says repealed the act that provided for the redistribution that I contend for. I maintain that no fair construction of the statute that he has brought to the attention of the Senate, in any sense repeals the provision of law under which I insist the redistribution of the currency capital was to be made.

But I will not stop to debate the legal view of it. I simply call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the present Secretary of the Treasury, in a work which he has prepared with great care—and a very useful book it is—holds the very same view contended for by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and myself, and other gentlemen, and the the Comptroller of Currency, whose very business it is to understand these statutes, to construe them according to his own judgment, and if he has doubt, to avail himself of the opinions of legal counsel, entertains the like view, and gives the same construction to the act; so that I say the position which I assumed a moment ago, that these banks in the Eastern States which received more than their proportionate apportionment, did so with their eyes open, and with a distinct understanding that at the time they should be required to return the excess they would do it.

Why, Mr. President, does any one suppose that Congress ever would have passed a currency act which would have allowed the concentration of $80,000,000 of currency capital in the New England States alone, in excess of what would be the fair and just proportion for other sections of the Union? The very statement of the proposition shows that it is absurd, that it never was so contemplated by Congress, and that such a construction ought not to be placed upon these States. Therefore, I say there is no "robbery," as contended by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] and others. He objected to the amendment, although I believe he said he would vote for it, upon the ground that it was "robbing" the East. It is no robbery at all. There was a solemn compact entered into between those banks who received this excess and the Government, that they would return it when the Government should require it for the benefit of other sections of the country, as plainly appears by the terms of the statute.

But then it is said, in opposition to the amendment, that if it is adopted it will disturb the monetary convenience of the people of the Eastern States, and thus disturb, to some extent, the monetary convenience of the whole country. I do not concur in that view. The honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who is familiar with this subject, having had the matter of currency under consideration for many years, has told us that in all probability $25,000,000 of this capital will not be redistributed within the next two years. If that is so, this redistribution will take place very gradually. I apprehend that it will be redistributed very gradually; that the West will desire it and require it very slowly; that the South will desire it and require it still more slowly. If that is so, if $25,000,000 only will be required within two years, it may be four or six or eight years before the whole $75,000,000 are required; and the change from one section to another will be so gradual that the monetary and business interests of the country will not feel it.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] has suggested that this is an increase of the circulation equal to $50,000,000. Why, sir, there is no proposition to increase the circulation a dollar by virtue of this amendment. It is to redistribute $80,000,000 of currency already in circulation by the banks in the Eastern States, to have it circulated by other banks located in the West and South. It is not proposed by this amendment to increase the circulation a dollar, and, on the other hand, it is not proposed to decrease it a dollar. We are compelled to keep within the present statutory limit; so that that objection amounts to nothing.

But then it is said that it is inexpedient, that it will not only derange the business interests of the country, but that the South and West do not need it; that if they need to effectuate exchanges, if there is anything to sell in the one section or the other, the money from the East will go there to make those exchanges, and therefore there is no occasion for such redistribution. I do not so believe. If more banks were established in the South and West, the result would be that the capital would be localized; business, enterprise, industry, agriculture, all sorts of industries and enterprises would be stimulated in their immediate locality; the money would be loaned out in the neighborhood of the bank, and every thirty, sixty, or ninety days it would have to be returned in order that it might be loaned out again. It would localize the industrial interests of the country, and it amounts to a local protection when it shall be redistributed.

But, sir, if it be true that the money will certainly return to the Eastern States after it is distributed in the West and South to make exchanges there, why, I ask, in the name of common sense, do these gentlemen in the East protest against it? If it will go there anyhow, if what they have contended for all through this discussion is true, that when the money is disbursed in the South and West, and goes into circulation there, it will flow back into the East because the South and West owe the East, why does the East object to locating the banks wherever they are wanted? Sir, their argument proves too much. Their sensitiveness about redistribution shows the truth, by indirection, of what myself and other gentlemen contend for—that it is necessary for the industry of the country, and the best interests of the whole country, that this redistribution should take place.

Let me add a word to what I have already said about the necessity for this measure; and I think I can make it about as forcible by a reference to my own State as in any other way. In the State of North Carolina the exchanges to be effected and the necessities for money are greater than they were before the late war. I do not state the fact too strongly when I say that the annual productions of North Carolina last year and the year before were equal in the gross to $70,000,000. The single item of cotton was equal to thirteen and a half millions; naval stores were between eight and ten millions; the tobacco crop was equal to three and a half millions; the wheat crop was worth two and a half millions; the oat crop, one million and a half; the rye crop, half a million. The production of these articles that I have mentioned in North Carolina was equal to $30,000,000. Then our interchanges have become greatly increased since the war. We have, in some measure, a new population; we have a new system of labor and one that requires greatly more exchanges. While our State is, comparatively, sparsely populated, and not so commercial in its character, exchanges are not effected as rapidly there as they are in New England, where the population is dense, and where they are highly commercial, and it takes more money in that section to make the exchanges.

Now let us see what condition those people are in. Anterior to the war North Carolina had a bank circulation of $5,218,598. Now our bank circulation is $1,819,300. In 1850 the per capita circulation was $5.26; now, with our increased wants in that respect, it is $1.70. Then three hundred thousand of our population were slaves; now that population are freemen, with the wants of freemen. We have a changed system of industry. I venture to say that the exchanges necessary to be made there this day are 33 per cent. greater than they were in 1850; and yet we have but the bank circulation I have mentioned, as appears by the report of the Comptroller that I have just found. Every Southern State is in a like condition; and yet there is a concentrated currency capital of over $80,000,000 in excess of the distribution allowed by law in half a dozen Eastern States, while the whole South is suffering in the manner and by and for the causes I have stated.

What is the result? The result is that industry languishes; that the farmer, the artisan, every one who is compelled to borrow money there, pays from 1 to 1½ and 2 per cent. a month for money. Is it not manifest that agriculture cannot prosper, that industry of all sorts cannot prosper, while the laborer pays that rate of interest? We are told that in the Eastern States interest is cheap; that they can get money there upon reasonable terms. So they can, if they have the proper sort of securities; but, sir, the very reason that money is so cheap there is, that it is concentrated there and seeks investment rapidly at the expense of the South and the West, where it is exceedingly scarce, and therefore the rate of interest very high. The ground of complaint is that they cannot get rid of this evil; the only money, the only volume of it allowed by law, is concentrated in the Eastern States, and there is no means of diverting it South and West unless the proposed amendment or one like it shall prevail.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, there is no objection to this amendment.

In the first place it is just, because those who receive this excess in the Eastern States agreed by the law with the Government at the time they received it to return it for redistribution when called upon. And let me mention this fact further, that I did not mention a moment ago and that I ought to have mentioned, they have received the benefit of that circulation for eight years, and have reaped the benefits by the way of profits upon that amount during that whole time, so that they have received ample compensation; and in view of the benefits that they have derived there is no practical injustice in requiring them to return this circulation to the Government, in order that it may be sent to the other sections of the country.

In the next place, the amendment is absolutely required. Any one must see at once that the concentration of $80,000,000 of currency capital in those States, when vast and most important sections of the country are unsupplied with it, cannot but affect the industries of the country, and all the business interests of the whole country, most unfavorably. If I had time I might go on to show that this concentration of capital there has stimulated, and in a large measure given rise to, the speculations that have resulted in the monetary evils and panics that we have experienced for the last four or five months, and repeatedly within the last seven or eight years.

Then, sir, there is a special reason why this redistribution should be made in the South. The Southern States are just emerging slowly, and very slowly indeed, from the effects of a devastating war. That country is impoverished, and they need to be helped by the Government, instead of being deprived in this way of advantages such as I have insisted they ought to have.

But I said the other day in some remarks which I had occasion to submit, that I thought the volume of currency circulation, even if we had a gold basis, is not sufficiently great. Having heard all that has been said on this subject, my views have not changed. I believe that the circulation of the country ought to be increased one hundred millions, and that if we had gold to-day and a convertible paper circulation, in order to make the necessary exchanges easily and promote the best interests of the country, the volume of the currency ought to be increased by one hundred millions. I believe that the temper of the Senate, whatever may be the views of individual gentlemen, is in that direction; and in order to test the sentiment of the Senate upon that point, I ask leave now to withdraw the amendment that I have offered and to submit a substitute for this bill. I will read the substitute which I propose to offer before I send it to the desk; but before I read it I will repeat what I said the other day, that I am opposed to the present national banking system, and offer the present proposed substitute to meet the present wants of the country, and as the measure most likely to bring prompt relief. This is the substitute I propose:

That $46,000,000 in notes for circulation shall be issued to national-banking associations now organized and which may hereafter be organized, in addition to such circulation, and under the same rules, regulations, and limitations as now authorized and prescribed by law.

I offer that as a substitute for the pending bill. It will be seen that in addition to the amount of bank circulation now allowed by law, which is three hundred and fifty-four millions, this proposed substitute will increase the volume of bank circulation to over four hundred millions. The operation of the substitute will be to have this increased banking capital distributed as the law now provides, according to population and wealth, having regard to and taking into calculation the present distribution of the currency capital of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment now offered by the Senator from North Carolina, to strike out the whole bill and insert the substitute which he has read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not rise to carry on this debate, but only to correct an error into which the honorable Senator from Ohio fell when he last spoke, in saying that in what I observed yesterday upon these statutes I did not refer to the act of 1865, of which he specially spoke. It will be found on the seventeenth page of to-day's RECORD that I did say, in replying to him when he had asked me if I had referred to the act of the 3d of March, 1865, thus:

Now, I shall be glad to know upon what system of ethics it is that any Senator turns around and says to the people of my State, or the people of Massachusetts, or Rhode Island, or of Ohio, or of anywhere, that we were in that violating any law or acting outside of the authority of law. They were accepting, as people who were to lend money to the Government, the proposition that the representatives of the nation here advanced to them to take their money upon those terms.

That is, the terms of the act of 1864.

Now you undertake to turn around, in 1865 or 1866—

As I did not remember the precise date of the act—and say, "Whatever may have been the truth about that, having now got your money and you having got our bonds, we choose to say to you that you shall surrender your money and take back our bonds."

So I think it will be manifest that I did not, either by accident or design, omit referring to the act of March 3, 1865, to which the honorable Senator says I did not refer, as he understood it. That is all I wish to say in order that we may be correct.

Mr. SHERMAN. But a word in reply; and I now have to say that my friend from Vermont put the cart before the horse in his inquiry last night, because this violation of the distribution did not occur until after the act of March 3, 1865, and consequently the people of Vermont and Rhode Island and Massachusetts did not organize banks in excess of their proportion until after the provisions of the act of March 3 had gone into operation, unless, indeed, in his construction of the other act of March 3, 1865, he is correct; but I believe that construction has been abandoned by both the gentlemen who have held the office of Comptroller since that construction was given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, who were the people who abandoned my construction of the internal-revenue act of March 3, 1865, which contained this authority to State banks? There was a distinguished citizen from Indiana, now a resident, I am sorry to say, of a foreign country, the Hon. Mr. McCulloch, who was Secretary of the Treasury following Mr. Fessenden. Mr. McCulloch was the Comptroller of the Currency when the act was passed, and became Secretary of the Treasury. It was under his administration as Secretary of the Treasury after the 3d of March, 1865, and after the passage of this act, that these things that the honorable Senator complains of were done. Mr. Hulburd was the successor of Mr. McCulloch, I believe, as Comptroller of the Currency. Now, I should be glad to know if it was understood at that time, during the years 1865 and 1866, that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, reporting to Congress, with the eye of the Committee on Finance upon them, and the eye of the House of Representatives upon them, were guilty of an act violating the statutes of the United States, in giving banking facilities to corporations that had no right to them? How did it happen that we did not hear of it then? Had not the House of Representatives got sufficiently intelligent to know whether an officer deserved impeachment, and that this was plainly violating a law? Had not the Committees on Finance of the two Houses sufficiently investigated the question to know whether or not this enormous outrage, as it is now called, of giving money to banks and to new associations in the Eastern States, which belonged elsewhere, was being perpetrated? The thing was not done under a bushel or in a corner. It was done in the face of the whole business community of all the States. It was published in the newspapers from day to day, and from week to week, everywhere, that such and such banks had changed from State to national, or such and such new associations had been formed. And it is a late invention—I use the word "invention" in no invidious sense, but in that true old sense of a finding out, and so I hope I shall offend nobody—it is a late invention which has discovered that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, under the eye of Congress, and reporting the facts to Congress year by year, were violating the laws of the United States in disposing of this currency as it was applied for.

The real fact of history, which may illustrate the meaning of these acts a little, is that there was not sufficient demand to take it up then, and that it was a drug in the Treasury and embarrassing the operations of the Government by the fact that the State banks would not turn over faster, and that new associations did not come forward faster; and if I am not wrong in my recollection, it was down even to the year 1868 before this sum was exhausted by the final applications of banks in the South. If I am wrong in that, the honorable Senator, who is familiar with these things, can correct me; but I take the hazard of saying that this fund was not exhausted until into or after the year 1868.

The honorable Senator says that I got the cart before the horse. By no means, Mr. President. We do not drive in that way in the East. What I said yesterday was in undertaking to defend the acts of the banks in receiving this money from the Treasury under the authority of the law of 1864 and down to March, 1865, when, as I undertook to point out and as it was agreed, there was no limitation, but anybody who applied and furnished the proper credentials of capital, ability, and honesty, was entitled to receive in the order that he applied the currency that he asked for. That was what I was defending; and then I went on to say that any construction of the two acts of 1865 which should hold that conduct of that character and in that time was unlawful, was, seeing that it was a violation of the public faith, to say to them, "You have done what you ought not to have done; you must give up everything that you have taken." That is what I was saying yesterday. So that, if my friend will pardon me, I must be excused from having the cart before the horse on that subject.

Thus when you come to that which took place after 1865, I repeat as a matter of history that millions remained in the Treasury until long after the time when under the seventh section of the internal-revenue act of March 3, 1865, the old State banks turning over had taken their proportions out of the general fund, just as the act said they might, the applications came from other States for funds, and there were funds enough to last them until 1868 or 1869; and the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, I am sure, will bear me out in the statement. If that be so, now when before the eyes of Congress and of the people, and in view of the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency of facts which showed that they were acting upon my present construction of the law, these acts passed without question from anybody, it is a little too late to say that they or the people who received the circulation have been acting in violation of law.

I do not say this, Mr. President, in opposition to the Senator's bill. I only say that if it is to pass—and I do not know but that I shall vote for it myself—it should pass upon the true and honest ground that the supreme authority of the nation thinks it right now to change the existing relations of the currency to the national banks. That they have the power to do that I do not question.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not intend to prolong this discussion by any remarks of mine, but I wish to refer to a single statement made by the Senator from Ohio so late last evening that I did not wish to take any more time then in replying to him. He stated the undoubted fact that under the State-bank system the circulation of Rhode Island was $6,000,000, and that now it is $13,000,000, and he argued that we had a much larger circulation under the national system than under our own State system, when we had all we wanted.

It is to be considered, Mr. President, that at the time when we had a circulation of $6,000,000, the entire bank circulation of the country was $238,000,000, and there was a gold circulation of I do not know how much, I suppose from $150,000,000 to $250,000,000; and now we have a bank circulation in Rhode Island of $13,000,000 when the total paper circulation of the country is not less than $782,000,000, and may rise to $800,000,000. When the State banks were forced into this national system the amount of currency issued was so great that it fell to 40 per cent. of its face at one time. There was one time when a greenback was worth only 40 per cent. of what it represented. Of course we required a great deal more currency to transact business on such a basis as that than we did when we really had a gold currency, for all before was practically a gold currency.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the permission of the Senator from Rhode Island, I will state that I have now the report of the Comptroller of the Currency showing the state of things on the 30th of December, 1869, even later than I spoke of, at which time there were only $317,992,516 of national bank circulation issued.

Mr. SHERMAN. Some of that must have been in place of what was withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends on when the additional $54,000,000 was authorized to be issued.

Mr. SHERMAN. The $54,000,000 additional to the $300,000,000 was authorized in 1870.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It says "circulation issued." When you go back to the next preceding year, 1868, they were three hundred and nine millions; if you go back to 1867 you will find that it was less than three hundred millions.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that the whole original $300,000,000 was taken up early in 1867.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, our circulation under the State system was thirty-six dollars per capita, and under the present system it is sixty-one dollars per capita. We have increased about 45 per cent. The total increase of the New England States has been about 50 per cent. The total increase of the Southwestern States has been nearly 300 per cent., and the increase of the State of Illinois has been more than 20 per cent. So that our increased circulation under the present system is in no greater proportion to the whole circulation of the country than it was before; and this proves that if we required the circulation which we then had to transact our business, we require the circulation which we now have; that in each case it is a normal condition of circulation.

The argument that bank capital is to be distributed per capita I think is little more sensible than that it should be distributed per acre. We might as well distribute coal per capita in a torrid climate as we would in a frigid climate. We cannot tell by any rule, by any formula, how much circulation is required in any State or in any particular portion of the country; but we can tell by this result: whenever banking is free, then the amount of circulation which a community can keep out and redeem is the amount which it requires; and that amount in Rhode Island is no more under the present system in proportion to the whole circulation of the country than it was under the old system.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have now a report of the Comptroller of the Currency before me, which I hope will settle one or two facts. It is the report dated October, 1865, a few months after the passage of the act of 3d March, 1865. It was the report sent in for the session of 1865–'66.

Mr. EDMUNDS. FREEMAN CLARKE'S report?

Mr. SHERMAN. FREEMAN CLARKE'S report. In this report the Comptroller says:

> By the seventh section of the "act amending the act to provide internal revenue to support the Government," approved March 3, 1865, the privilege of conversion on the part of State banks was extended, so as to give a preference to those which should apply prior to the 1st day of July, 1865, over new associations applying for the privileges of the national-currency act.
> The result has been that nearly all of the State banks have voluntarily changed into national associations, and it is a gratifying fact that this transformation has been accomplished without deranging the business of these institutions, or affecting essentially the volume of bank-note circulation.

Up to the beginning of the previous year the whole amount of circulation authorized was $65,000,000, but in a single year by the operation of this section the full amount of banking capital was reached under the act. He says:

> The national banks already organized embody a capital sufficient to entitle them to receive $309,672,992 of circulation on the deposit of the requisite securities in Government bonds. It is not anticipated, however, that more than three hundred millions will be called for by banks now organized, as many of them, located in large cities of the Northern States, will not ask for the amount of circulation to which their capital entitles them. Bonds have been deposited to entitle the banks now organized to $244,754,125 of circulation only.

Immediately after the passage of this act there was a rush into the national banking system, and at the next session of Congress the whole amount was practically exhausted, although I believe there were banks organized until the following year. The Senator from Iowa says there were banks organized up to the beginning of 1867.

Mr. ALLISON. Two hundred and ninety-two million dollars is stated in the annual report of 1866, and the balance was taken up early in 1867.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont asks why complaint was not made about this at the time. Complaint was made about it at the next session of Congress. The Senator asks, why was it not proposed to impeach Mr. CLARKE? It was not an impeachable offense. It was manifest that these two acts did give a color of authority to allow a preference to State banks; but neither the Senate of the United States nor any court would impeach a man as a criminal for mistaking a construction of law. Though I think it was a great mistake, certainly it was not an impeachable offense. Men will differ in construing these acts. No doubt Mr. FREEMAN CLARKE did honestly decide, though he decided wrongly, in regard to the construction of these acts. But the mischief was done, and it has always been a source of complaint, and from that day to this has been a standing sore; and I did hope that by the passage of this bill we should forever get rid of it.

I heard one Senator from New England say that he would be willing to give up the whole bank circulation of his State rather than hold on to it by a misconstruction, or an error, or to the damage of other sections. That is the general feeling.

And now again, in closing this matter up, I beg a vote, and I appeal to Senators not to thrust upon this bill the great and difficult question that is now presented by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. If the Senate should adopt that amendment and thus kill this bill, which is intended to regulate an inequality in the distribution of bank circulation—if they should thrust that amendment on the bill in order to kill off this bill, because that will be the effect of it—then it opens the broad field, the question of whether we shall embark in the wide sea of paper money, whether we shall take national-bank paper or greenback money; and what limit shall be fixed upon it, opening all the whole range of subjects that we have been discussing so long.

I say that in the Senate of the United States we ought to approach this question deliberately and fairly. If this question of inflation or expansion, or the increase of bank currency, or the increase of greenbacks, is to be met, let us meet it, as it comes up in due order, deliberately, and let each man take his responsibility; because the question thus presented of inflating the currency and increasing our circulation is the great question of our day, which must determine the fate and fortunes of many, as well as the condition of our country, its prosperity, its happiness, and its glory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not interrupt the Senator I should like to ask him one question in regard to the remark he made. He spoke of killing this bill by bringing in this amendment. I hope he does not understand that those gentlemen who may think that this bill is a wrong to eastern banks are in favor of this proposition now offered as an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not. I desire to say now that if this proposition is adopted it will be adopted against the wishes of a majority at least of the Senators who represent the States that are affected by its operation. It is not, therefore, an indisposition on the part of Senators representing those States to correct this inequality, but the presentation of this great question of the inflation of paper currency, increase of our paper currency, will have the effect to defeat this honest effort to satisfy a local demand.

Mr. President, Senators need not fear for a moment that when this bill is passed the other question will not be presented to them. It cannot be avoided; and I, for one, not only desire to bring it, but will bring it to the attention of the Senate at every opportune moment. Indeed, it was understood, so far as the Senator from Maine, who has charge of the appropriation bills, is concerned, that as soon as the naval appropriation bill is disposed of we will take up and decide once and for all whether we will increase the paper money of this country; whether it shall be in the form of greenbacks or bank-notes, and whether there shall be some plan for the redemption of the notes now outstanding. All these are great questions, and I appeal to Senators not to thrust them as an amendment to kill off this bill, which is an honest effort to remove a local difficulty and a local complaint. That is not the way in which we should conduct our business, to attempt to override a measure that all seem to be in favor of, by thrusting in a question of the greatest magnitude upon which men have honest differences of opinion.

I say for one, with my strong convictions against the impolicy now of issuing more paper money or adopting the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, I would rather see the national banks of this country all go out of existence or be piled into the little State of Rhode Island. The question of the distribution of bank circulation is a matter of infinite importance compared with the importance of the question of the increase of paper money.

I hope Senators, therefore, will give us a fair vote on this bill, and not seek to avoid it by thrusting in this greater question. Let us have the question raised by the bill determined, and then we will meet them at Philippi.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I understand the pending question is on the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina as a substitute for the entire bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WRIGHT. It will be in order, I suppose, to move to perfect the bill before the vote is taken on the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to amend the bill as reported from the committee, in the line that was proposed to be amended by the Senator from North Carolina, in the first place, by striking out "25" and inserting "75," by striking out $25,000,000 as the sum to be redistributed and inserting $50,000,000. And upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT. Having offered this amendment, Mr. President, I wish to say a word on the substitute moved by the Senator from North Carolina, and to state the reasons that influence me in voting for my amendment and against his substitute.

In the first place, I shall vote against the substitute for the reason that as it stands now it seems to me to be in a very imperfect shape. It is known that I have declared here that if there is to be an increase of circulation, my preference is for an increase of what are commonly known as greenbacks. If, however, this increase is to be an increase of bank circulation, then I am in favor of free banking. If there is to be an increase of circulation in any definite or limited sum, then I want that increase so distributed as that the destitute portions of the country shall have the benefit of such increase, and not have it, as is proposed by the substitute, that the banks now in existence and banks hereafter to be formed can alike take it up. I understand the substitute as it now stands to authorize an increase of forty-six millions of circulation to be taken up by the banks now organized or that may hereafter be organized; and it will occur, as it seems to me, if there be injustice or inequality in the present distribution of the currency, that that injustice or inequality will probably be kept up. I therefore am opposed to the substitute for the reason that it seems to me it does not reach the end that we in the West and South desire.

Now, I have proposed fifty instead of seventy-five millions, and I will give you my reason for it. It seems to be claimed here by our friends from the East, and also to be conceded to some extent by those from the West and South, that it is hardly just or fair to the banks in the older States that have their capital invested to take from them what it is conceded is their excess at present. While I am not prepared to concede that that is unjust to the extent insisted on by them, I think there is a fair degree of strength in the argument as suggested by them that it should not be taken from them. But when we come to this question, as in all questions, it seems to me we must remember that we have an entire country here, and we must seek to do justice to all portions of the country alike.

The legislation that we are now seeking to correct was based upon the idea that it was just and proper to distribute the circulation having reference to the wealth, the industry, and the population of the country. That was either right or wrong. If it was right at the time, and if nothing has occurred since to change it, then it seems to me to be but fair and right that we should have reference to the increase of wealth, the increase of industries, and the increase of population in the West and South; and that while we shall seek not to do injustice to the older portions of the country—the East—by taking from them all of their excess of circulation, as they claim that that would be unjust, nevertheless we should, in such increase, have some reference to our changed condition in the South and West. It has occurred to me that $50,000,000 would be fair to the East, and perhaps reasonably fair to us; and when I come to consider this question, as I seek to do upon all others, my object is, as far as possible, to do exact justice to all portions of the country alike. It seems to me that if we seek to distribute $50,000,000 more there can be no fair ground of complaint on the part of the East, especially as they say here themselves that while they think, in view of their investments, we ought not to distribute it, yet they prefer infinitely to do that rather than to increase the currency; and it is said here that they would rather do anything than to have the currency increased. Now I submit, as a compromise proposition, that we provide for a redistribution of $50,000,000 of the bank currency.

I understand that the bill, as it has been amended since it was reported by the Committee on Finance, provides that we shall not wait until the circulation of the banks having an excess shall be brought in, but the Comptroller of the Currency is directed to proceed at once to issue this circulation to the destitute portions of the country where application has been made and to call in the circulation afterward. In my opinion it will not take the two years that have been spoken of here to get this circulation by the West and South. I know that there are more than half a dozen organizations in my own State who are ready to take this circulation if they can get it; and in my judgment it will not be three months until applications will be made from my State, and they will get circulation if they can have it in that time. I therefore submit now that instead of undertaking in this bill to increase the circulation, and especially in the direction indicated by the Senator from North Carolina in his amendment, we provide for the redistribution of the fifty millions, and therefore get that secured to the West and to the South.

I object to the substitute for another reason. I have said that if we have an increase of circulation of national-bank paper I believe in free banks. I do not believe in this policy of having close corporations without reference to this banking circulation. It is a complaint all over this land now, as we know full well, that these banks have been organized, and that the men having the capital hold on to that circulation, and that other men having capital ready to invest in these banks are not given the opportunity, and they say if it is right and proper that we should have this bank circulation, then have it free, and let any and all persons that have capital and propose to engage in this enterprise come in and have the benefit. If you say that you will limit it to four hundred millions, then the same complaint will continue precisely as it continues now with reference to bank circulation and the limitation of the amount of such circulation.

I say, therefore, that I think a fair compromise may be made here by providing that there shall be a redistribution of fifty millions. If it can be taken in the South and in the West, I am sure that our friends in the East ought not to object to it. I think they will not object to a fair proposition upon this subject. I therefore propose, as already indicated, that we shall amend the present bill by striking out $25,000,000 and inserting $50,000,000. That is a fair compromise, as it seems to me, between what is claimed by us in the West and South as what we are entitled to in full, some seventy-five or eighty millions, and at the same time I think will not do such injustice to the East as they claim it will. Whether it be injustice I do not now undertake to determine, but certainly it will not work such injustice as that they can justly complain.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I rose a moment ago merely to reply to the appeal made by the Senator from Ohio to Senators having different views upon this proposition, those who desire not to relinquish a portion of the currency they now have and those in the West who desire to have a portion of this currency.

The proposition introduced by the Senator from North Carolina brings the question squarely before the Senate, and it is as fair a proposition as can be proposed. The argument made by the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, is that we should wait until the proper time and then discuss the question, because he says that some persons want greenbacks and others national-bank currency. Why, sir, the Senator knows that the very argument that he makes is for the purpose of causing this difference of opinion, or at least it tends in that direction; because I believe from his statement—and I certainly have a right to say it—that he is opposed under any and all circumstances to an increase of the circulation either of United States notes or national-bank notes under any circumstances, except according to a proposition of free banking based on a redemption that he proposed in the bill which he introduced during the last Congress. Of course, then, his argument is against this proposition, and it is because this proposition is just the opposite of his theory on this subject of currency.

Those of us who believe that there ought to be a moderate increase of currency (for this is but a moderate increase) can well favor this proposition to equalize the national-bank currency and the United States currency. Four hundred million dollars of United States currency exists to-day as the means of redeeming the national-bank currency. Hence, there is no reason why the national-bank currency, to be redeemed by the United States currency, should not be equalized in amount to the latter.

If we are to have an increase of the currency at all, is not the fairest way of doing it to equalize these two different classes of currency? So far, then, as this proposition is concerned, it is, as I said, a fair one. It is proper in this very place, because, as has been argued by Senators, no person desires to disturb the relations of the banks to the Government or to their stockholders, if it can be avoided; and it is only in an extreme case, where the West and South are denied everything, that they would ask these banks to distribute a portion of their circulation. Now, if you will give $46,000,000 increase of circulation, equalize the two classes of currency, one of which redeems the other, then I for one say I will vote to repeal in toto this law of distribution, and let the States keep the currency they now have.

It is a fair proposition, it is an honest proposition, and it is one that brings us squarely to the test. I make the same appeal to those men who believe there ought to be a moderate increase of currency to vote for this proposition that the Senator from Ohio makes to those who are opposed to it to vote it down. He wants it voted down so that this bill may be a wedge put in between the increase of the currency and specie payments; for this bill is nothing more nor less than a mere entering wedge to prevent the increase of currency in this country. That is the meaning of it; because the Senator himself says that he is opposed to an increase on the basis on which the national banks now stand; and therefore I believe the proposition to be correct as I stated it, that this bill for redistribution is to prevent the increase of any more circulation in this country; and if we get that, it is all that is to be had, and it must be accepted. Hence I appeal to-day to the friends of an increase to stand together, and let this vote be the test. If the Senate is opposed to any further increase of currency in this country, we had just as well say so on this proposition as to be discussing it for weeks and then saying so on some other proposition. Hence I appeal to the friends of an increase to make it the test here to-day, or whenever the vote is taken, for it is equalizing, as I said, the two kinds of currency. It is as fair a test as any we can have. Let it be made the test; and if the contractionists on this floor, the gentlemen who desire to contract the currency or those who desire to have no more currency in this country, have a majority, in God's name we acquiesce. That ends the fight; and the voice of the people, through their representatives here, decides the question. But if there is a majority in favor of an increase of forty-six millions of currency in this country, as the representatives of the people, on our part, we have as much right that our voice shall be heeded as you have that yours shall be.

Let no deception be practiced; let it be a square vote and decide this question. That ends it. Then you can report your bills according to the sentiment of the majority of the Senate. But let the Senators that are in favor of a moderate increase not be divided upon the question whether we shall have greenbacks or national currency. Let that not be a point of division. That gives the advantage against us. Let us stand by this proposition for an increase, and after that is decided discuss the other question among ourselves as to which we will agree upon. There is as much in men's standing together in reference to a proposition that they nearly agree about as there is in anything else. Of course, distraction thrown into the chamber of any legislative body can disperse those that ought to vote for a proposition, and in that way they are always defeated; and if defeat comes in the Senate Chamber now to this proposition, it is merely by the strategy of those men who are opposed to any increase whatever and are determined to retain the status as it is and do as they have argued here should be done—provide some ways or means for contraction of the currency. When men talk about specie payments now they mean contraction, for there is no other mode to arrive at specie payments at present but that.

I say, then, that this amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is a fair one, and I say to my friend from Iowa, with whom I agreed in the first part of the session in the speech he made in reference to the wants of the people, that I supposed we were together on this proposition. I do not say that he said so in terms, but he spoke upon the two propositions that were up before, the one by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] and the other reported by the Committee on Finance, in reference to a return to specie payments, while the proposition of the Senator from Michigan was for a moderate increase of the currency. Those were the two propositions that were before the Senate and under discussion at the time, and this is but a part of one of the propositions. This is but the same proposition as introduced by the Senator from Michigan, substantially, and the one upon which the discussion arose in the Senate Chamber and upon which we divided here in our opinions. If we are to be defeated by mere quibbles, let it be done now.

I do not desire to prolong this discussion, and do not desire to enter into the merits of the question as to whether we should have an increase or not. That has been fully discussed here on the floor before. I was heard fully on that question and do not desire to discuss it any further. I merely rose, as I said, to appeal to the friends of a moderate increase of the currency to stand by this proposition and let it be made a test, and then the committee can report according to the instructions of the Senate such a bill as conforms to the peculiar notions of the majority. It was only for that purpose, and not to discuss the question at any further length, that I rose.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, I can appreciate the appeal that has been made by the Senator from Illinois to the friends of a moderate increase of the currency. I think it is well known to the Senate that in the early part of the session I proposed an increase of the currency in the form of Government issues. I stand so to-day as my first choice, and I base that choice in measure upon economic considerations. The Government is now indirectly providing issues to the nation through the national banks, at a cost to the people of over eighteen millions annually of coin interest. To save that coin interest, I proposed that the nation should issue the whole volume of currency in the form of greenbacks or legal-tenders. Believing then, as I have stated since, that the question of an increase of currency to meet the adequate demands of the country was of greater importance than the mere form, and so stated when I modified my original substitute for the resolution of the Finance Committee into the simple proposition of a moderate increase of the currency, I added that, while I did not waive my first choice and judgment, I did, for the purpose of testing the Senate upon the question whether the country was to be relieved by an increase or not, modify my proposition, as the Senator from Illinois has stated, by putting it simply upon an increase without regard to the character of the currency. It was of far greater importance in affording immediate relief to commercial prostration to imply, by an affirmative vote of the Senate, that the remedy should be by an increase of currency than it was to decide which form of money was to be authorized. The one was primary and most vital and the other secondary and less essential in such a national exigency. The volume fixed, the character of it could subsequently be determined.

Now I regret very much that the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] a staunch supporter, who has stood with us in the struggle so far for an increase sufficient to meet the demands of the country and furnish a remedy for the panic and its evils, should have proposed the amendment which is now pending, and thus have tied up more or less Senators upon this primary question. I confess that I feel myself embarrassed now. I have no disposition to take from the States of the East the currency which they have, and that, too, in the face of the protest of the Senator from Rhode Island who, representing his constituents, as well, doubtless, as other constituents of New England States, has declared in a formal manner that they have no more currency than they need. I declared then, as I reiterate now, that that protest and his demand is the strongest argument the country can ask upon the question of an adequate currency. If Rhode Island, the smallest State, has not currency enough, and demands that her thirty-one dollars per capita of national-bank currency should be assured to her, for the same reason the West and South should demand an equal amount of currency also. The question thus turns simply upon an increase that will equalize the circulation in other States with that of New England. I say again that I have no hostility to New England, but I may be forced to vote, against my inclination, to reduce her currency, if left alone to the question of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. Why do I say it? If we are to be shut out from an increase of the currency, then I assume that New England should not claim and retain an excessive proportion of bank currency. She has no right to it upon any principle of justice, and some of her Senators here declare that they are unwilling to act upon a principle of injustice, and yet I do not forget the protest, fortified by the able presentation of the Senator from Rhode Island, that his State has no more currency than she needs.

We are reminded, too, of the question of good faith, and told that when these States, in the midst of our struggle, met the demand of the country in supplying their means, we now, when the struggle is past, and triumph peacefully smiles upon the land, should not take back from them what they secured during the war. Upon that principle I am opposed to taking from New England any portion of her currency; but I do say once more that I regret that my friend from Iowa has, in my judgment, complicated the question by his amendment.

Moreover, I am not to be frightened out of my position on this point by intimidation. If I were to refer to the proceedings when the national issue was first authorized, and when it was proposed in the House of Representatives to allow the national-bank circulation to reach the limit of but three hundred millions, Senators now on this floor attempted then to cry it down by threats of national disaster. It was said then that "if we permit this inflation to go on we shall do our country a greater harm than the confederates can possibly do by defeating any one of our armies." And this was said when we had but three hundred millions of greenbacks and it was proposed to increase the volume of currency three hundred millions more through national currency. To-day we have substantially a repetition of that threat, and we are told that if this increase comes now disaster will result to the country. Why, sir, we have disaster now, curable by an increase of currency, and yet it is denied to intensify that disaster. Tell me not that the panic has ceased. Its blaze may have been extinguished, but it smoulders, ready to break out at any incidental disturbance; yet we are told that the panic has passed by with all its effects. We are pointed to New York. I see in his seat one of the Senators representing that city, who tells us that the vaults of her banks are swelling with greenbacks issued by the Government. It may be true; but at the same time not a dollar can be drawn from them except upon a loan at call, supported by the best collaterals. What benefit is that to the country? What benefit is it to New York merchants who want to borrow at two to four months? Many of them cannot get it to save them from insolvency.

If I were to indulge myself at this moment, reference to the reports of mercantile agencies would show that the failures in the country during the past year were far in excess of those of the year before. That fact, coming from an official source, tells the country to-day of the serious nature of the disturbance in our monetary affairs.

In view of these circumstances I call the attention of Senators to the gravity of the question, whether or not we shall increase and expand, not inflate, the currency in proportion simply to the expansive demands of the business of the nation—precisely that and nothing more. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] the other day cast epithets on this effort to meet this national expansion. Sir, I regretted to hear them; for I always listen to that Senator with admiration for his rhetorical powers. When, however, he sought terms of ridicule, massed figures into hyperbole of derision to gainsay or overthrow what he failed to do by logic, admiration turned into disappointment. He, with others, persists in denying any increase of the currency, let the disaster be what it will.

Now it is proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance to postpone the test on an increase and let the bill pass as he reported it. This would be a waiver of the issue. I propose to stand by the contest shoulder to shoulder with the Senator from Illinios and our friends from the South.

Sir, I am not responsible for the form in which this question is now before the Senate; but inasmuch as it is here now, and the proposition is made to withdraw or postpone it, I cannot consent to it. The chairman of the Committee on Finance is opposed to expansion except based upon resumption, which he has as well stated is a practical impossibility. Having no direct agency in the form of the measure here, I am prepared to confront it as I find it, and am ready to meet it. Unwilling as I am to take away from New England what she needs, for she has wealth and capital, and employs her currency; with equal magnanimity and equal justice she ought to give as liberally with the left hand what is taken with the right. Bound to these States by a common interest, part of a common country, their success and prosperity are our success and our prosperity. In the language of the Senator from Illinois, the issue is right here now and forced upon us, shall we increase or shall we refuse to increase the currency? According to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, what he proposes is substantially a volume of $800,000,000. It reaches, as I am reminded, precisely to the volume I suggested upon the fourth day of this session. I asked then that the $44,000,000 reserve should be utilized and made a part of the permanent circulation; and that there should be sufficient increase to make up the whole volume to $800,000,000. I am gratified that the apparent judgment now conforms to what was suggested so early in the session upon the maximum of circulation. The amendment proposed now by the Senator from North Carolina, with the $44,000,000 reserve now nearly issued, will make a total of $800,000,000. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that if that proposition does not provide for a proper distribution in his judgment, it is open to amendment. Let him propose to confine it to the West and South, leaving New England with the currency she now has, and give the whole $46,000,000 to the West and South, thus establishing a fairer basis of equality among sister States. Adopt this proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, and I shall be in favor of repealing the law requiring the withdrawal from New England and the redistribution of $25,000,000.

The friends of a moderate increase of the currency should stand now by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, whether the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is carried or not. Let us support the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. Modify it, if you please, in its distribution, but let us settle now the question whether the Senate will give an increase of currency, or declare by denial that the country must struggle on amid prostration and ruin to specie resumption.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1064) to authorize the Secretary of War to lease not exceeding five acres of the tract of land known as the Old Lazaretto tract, for the purpose of erecting thereon a magazine or storehouse for the storage of gunpowder;

A bill (H. R. No. 1932) for the relief of Frank M. Kelly; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 29) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expense incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota, for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all other expenses of the volunteer forces of the Indian war of 1862.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONOVER. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 12, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BANKRUPT LAW.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, the House took from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1872, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto; and the same were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to communicate to this House the report of the board of engineers on the radical improvement of the Ohio River by hydraulic gates and movable dams.

VIOLATION OF THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, there are some executive documents upon the table which ought to go to the printer. I ask by unanimous consent that they be laid before the House at this time.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to the resolution of the House of December 2, 1873, in relation to the amount of money paid since the 4th of March, 1869, to any person or persons in the settlement of suits, judgments, or claims by or in behalf of the United States, for the violation of the revenue laws at Boston and New York custom-houses, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. I move that it be printed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it a matter of course to print that large mass of material?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to the printing.

Mr. MAYNARD. I submit it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means, and let that committee decide whether it ought to be printed or not.

Mr. DAWES. Some of the Committee on Ways and Means have already examined it, and they think it is an important document, and ought to be printed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make no further objection.

The document was ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE OHIO RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of February 9, 1874, in relation to the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGES OVER NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the draught of an act to regulate the construction of bridges over the navigable waters of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

IMPRISONMENT OF AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. SMART, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, to lay before this House the correspondence between the commander of the United States steamer Richmond—Captain Thomas Patterson—and the governor of Santiago de Cuba in April, 1873, in reference to three American citizens who were on trial before a military court-martial at that place; and to accompany the correspondence with the protest made against said proceeding and the demand made on the said governor for their surrender, and other papers relating to the subject. And also that the Secretary inform this House whether the three American citizens were delivered to Captain Patterson.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on Military Affairs.

DAVID BRADEN.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 353) for the relief of David Braden; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

SALE OF FORT REYNOLDS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1161) to authorize the sale of the military reservation of Fort Reynolds, in Colorado Territory, and the Government buildings thereon, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute (H. R. No. 1931) was received, and read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the substitute alone will be read.

The substitute was read as follows:

A bill to authorize the sale of the military reservation of Fort Reynolds in Colorado Territory, and the Government buildings thereon.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to transfer to the custody and control of the Secretary of the Interior, for disposition for cash, according to the existing laws of the United States, relating to the public lands after appraisement, to the highest bidder, and at not less than the appraised value, nor at less than $1.25 per acre, the United States military reservation of Fort Reynolds in Colorado Territory, containing about twenty-three square miles, as set apart and declared by the President, on June 22, 1868, including all the buildings heretofore erected by the United States, and now being thereon, (the said reservation and buildings being no longer needed for military purposes:) Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the said land to be offered in tracts of not more than eighty acres each, and sold separately at public outcry to the highest bidder.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a single word of explanation in reference to this bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether that bill is not liable to the point of order, as authorizing the sale of public property?

Mr. GUNCKEL. There is no appropriation of public money in it. It is a bill for the sale of land, and will bring money into the Treasury instead of paying it out.

Mr. COBURN. It is only a provision for the sale of a reservation. There can be no possible application to it of the rule as to appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill would be liable to the point of order under a literal application of the rule; but as it is to sell the land to the highest bidder at public auction, provided the price is not less than the stipulated price of the public lands, the Chair presumed the bill might without objection be considered in the House.

Mr. GUNCKEL. The Secretary of War states that the property is not needed for military purposes, and at the last session of Congress recommended that it be sold. The Committee on Military Affairs report this bill, which simply directs that this property be turned over to the Secretary of the Interior and sold under the rules and regulations prescribed by law after appraisement, at public bidding, and to the highest bidder.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Chair that the bill is one which the rule lately adopted was intended expressly to reach. It provides for the disposition of public property. It provides certain conditions as to the size of the tracts in which it shall be offered, and puts it into the power of the proper public officer to superintend the sale. Now, it is perfectly true that what is proposed may be a fair disposition of the property; but it is perfectly true, also, that the order to sell the land at a particular time may be very much against the interests of the public. And the right to discuss that in Committee of the Whole is secured by the rule. I have no objection to this particular bill, but it seems to me very important that the rule should be enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to observe that it would not, as a rule, do to say, because the United States was disposing of something for a consideration, that the bill did not fall within the rule. There might be very many cases in which, though a consideration was placed in a bill, it would be amenable to the rule, but in this particular case the Chair did not think that a stringent enforcement of the rule was called for.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The bill provides not only for the sale of public lands, but of public buildings; and although this bill undoubtedly is a perfectly innocent one, as we may be satisfied from the character of the committee from which it comes, this class of bills may be a very dangerous one; and to secure a consideration for them in Committee of the Whole is the very thing the rule is intended to accomplish.

Mr. COBURN. I ask for the reading of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] in its general application is a correct one. The fact that the sale is for a consideration would apply to the case of the bill, for instance, for the encouragement of the growth of trees on the public domain. There was a proposition to give certain parts of the public domain for that consideration, and the Chair ruled that it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. And, on a stringent ruling, this bill would also be so referred. The rule reads thus:

All bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

This bill does make an appropriation of property, and not any the less because there is a consideration for it. If it were admitted that the substitution of a consideration could waive the rule, the rule could be waived in many cases. But this is a bill framed in perfect good faith, and about which there can be no doubt. And, therefore, the Chair did not rule to send it to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COBURN. The rule applies to bills making appropriations. Now, what can there be in the word "appropriation" that is applicable to the authority to sell land? There can be no signification of the word "appropriation" in the remotest degree whatever that would apply to the sale of land. You might as well call the general laws that apply to the sale of public lands appropriation bills, as say that a bill like this, or any bill giving a Department of the Government the authority to sell land, makes an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman is to argue the rule instead of the bill, the Chair will submit an illustration: If a bill should be brought in from the Committee on the Public Lands providing that in future the public lands might be disposed of at public auction at a price not less than ten cents an acre, would the gentleman from Indiana justify the Chair in having it considered in the House?

Mr. COBURN. I would not.

The SPEAKER. Precisely the same argument applies in this case.

Mr. COBURN. I intend to say I would not justify the Chair. The Chair would have no right to rule that it must be considered in Committee of the Whole, for it would be in no sense an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair differs widely from the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman entirely misapprehends the scope of the rule. It would be a gross violation, in the judgment of the Chair, of the letter and spirit of the rule, to allow a bill of that kind to be considered in the House; but this bill is evidently offered in good faith, and the Chair is willing to have it considered in the House. At the same time the Chair does not desire it to be understood that the rule could be construed as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] construes it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I am perfectly willing to withdraw the objection, but I desired to save the precedent.

The SPEAKER. The precedent will be saved as long as the present occupant is in the chair.

Mr. LOWE. As I understand it, this bill makes a disposition of a large tract of land. I would like to inquire whether there is any reason why this tract of land should not be disposed of under the pre-emption and homestead laws? I can readily understand that as to that portion of the tract which is occupied by public buildings it should possibly be sold at auction to the highest bidder; but most of the land is outside of the improvements, and why should it not be disposed of under the homestead and pre-emption laws?

Mr. GUNCKEL. I would say that there are thirteen square miles in this tract, with buildings upon a part of it, and the whole tract is supposed to be of special value. The committee, following what has heretofore been the action of Congress, provided that it shall be sold at public auction for not less than two-thirds of the appraised value. We were apprehensive that there might be some arrangement by which some one would get the land for less than what it is worth. The bill is in the line of the precedents of Congress.

Mr. LOWE. Allow me a single additional question, and it is this: Whether upon these thirteen square miles there are any settlers claiming any rights under the homestead or pre-emption laws, or otherwise?

Mr. GUNCKEL. I do not know. I say simply that the Secretary of War recommended last session that this property should be sold, and said nothing of any such complication. He renews the recommendation this session, and I presume there are no complications of the sort.

Mr. DONNAN. Let me say that this property lies in a section where it is undoubtedly worth a great deal more than the ordinary public domain. There is no reason in the world why the Government should not realize the worth of the property.

Then as to the other question of the gentleman from Kansas, I would say that if there are any settlers on this reservation they are there without any right whatever, and there is no reason why any right should be retained for them; they are simply squatters without any shadow of right.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I yield now to the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. CHAFFEE,] who knows all about this matter, and can explain it to the House.

Mr. CHAFFEE. There are about twenty-three sections of land which have been reserved by the Government for the military reservation in Colorado called Fort Reynolds. Upon this land there have been erected some buildings which, although I have not myself seen them personally, are represented by the Secretary of War to be worth several thousand dollars. It is for that reason that he recommends a sale of the land and buildings. Otherwise I should have recommended, as I did in the case of Fort Collins, their restoration for pre-emption and homestead purposes; but, inasmuch as the Government has buildings and other improvements on the reservation, it is deemed proper by the Secretary of War to authorize its sale to the highest bidder. Hence this bill.

Mr. KASSON. I want to say a word upon this measure, as it touches the disposition of the public lands and the principle upon which we are to act. I think what has been said by the gentleman from Colorado indicates that the bill should, perhaps, make special provision for the sale of the tract immediately about and including the buildings. But I do think that, for the interest of the Territory and of the people of the country generally, much more than of the Treasury of the United States, these lands should be open to actual settlers in preference to all others. A very large tract of land in this military reservation would satisfy the wants of a very considerable colony of actual settlers. But the moment it is open for sale, without limitation, at a price not less than the appraised value, that very moment it is put into the power of capitalists to override the actual settlers in all cases. Owing to the generally great desirability of lands originally selected for military reservations the capitalists of the country would prefer it to any public lands in the neighborhood. These lands are usually the highest-priced lands in a new Territory.

I wish, therefore, very much that the committee would consider that point, and provide that only that part necessary to carry the public buildings shall be subject to this public sale, and allow the rest of the reservation to be disposed of under the homestead laws of the United States. I do not desire at all to interfere with what the committee may think proper; but I should be very glad if they would take this matter into further consideration before pressing this bill to a vote. So much on that point.

The other point to which I wish to call attention is, that in case of sale as proposed by this bill, if I understood it aright—and if I did not understand it correctly, the gentleman in charge of the bill will inform me—there is no provision requiring any length of notice to the public with a view of realizing the full value of the land, and giving notice to all who may wish to purchase. Therefore, if the committee conclude to go on with the bill at the present time, I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. GUNCKEL] to accept as an amendment a provision to this effect: "After giving not less than three months' public notice of the time and place of sale, in not less than three public newspapers printed and published in said Territory." I suggest that provision in order that there may be no combination on the part of capitalists to get possession of this land at less than its real value.

I should be glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] upon these two points. I hope the committee will consent to consider the point that subjects the whole of this large tract of land to the operation of speculators instead of to actual settlers, a class of inhabitants I know the Territories want.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE.]

Mr. CROUNSE. I think this land occupies a different attitude from other public lands which, from motives of policy, should be thrown open to homesteading and pre-emption. This land has a peculiar value, as I understand it, because of its having been occupied for military purposes. This being a military reservation, and having been such for some time, it has been subjected to improvement to quite an extent. And I am advised these improvements extend over the entire tract of twenty-three sections. Around this military reservation, as around military reservations generally, there are probably settlers, and if this reservation is thrown open to pre-emption and homsteading those settlers would immediately have advantage of the first opportunity to secure to themselves valuable tracts of land—an advantage which is not contemplated by the general pre-emption and homestead laws.

This being an exceptional case, having reference to a particular tract of land, the value of which is particularly enhanced by reason of its use as a military reservation, it seems to me that the Government would realize more by having it sold at public auction, and that such a course would not impair or infringe the general rights of settlers on the public lands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] whether or not there is any report accompanying this bill, or any letter from the Secretary of War explaining the necessity for this sale, as proposed by the bill?

Mr. GUNCKEL. I will answer the gentleman by sending to the Clerk's desk to be read a communication from the Secretary of War on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 1, 1873.

The Secretary of War has the honor to invite the attention of the House of Representatives to the draught of an act to authorize the sale of the military reservation at Fort Reynolds, Colorado Territory, and the Government buildings thereon, which was submitted by him to the House on the 25th of February, 1873. No action having been taken at the last session of Congress with reference to this matter, he has the honor to renew his recommendation for the passage of an act to authorize the sale of this reservation.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Mr. GUNCKEL. It will be observed that the first communication was sent in only a few days before the adjournment of Congress, and so late that it could not be acted upon. It now comes back; and I have been directed by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Military Affairs to report this bill. To avoid anything like favoritism or the opportunity of a job, we provided that, as this is a tract of bottom lands and particularly valuable, it should be sold in tracts of not more than eighty acres each, after notice, and to the highest bidder. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] looks to a longer notice. We do not object to that, because it is in the proper direction. And with the consent of the Committee on Military Affairs I will permit the amendment to be offered and voted upon.

Mr. KASSON. I will then move to amend the bill by adding after the words "to the highest bidder" the following:

After giving not less than three months' public notice of the time and place of sale, in not less than three public newspapers printed and published in said Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GUNCKEL. One word more. The pre-emption law and the homestead law apply to all the other lands in the United States. Here is a special tract, heretofore held for a special purpose, and of special value. We merely provide that the General Government shall do what any prudent individual would do in a like case, that is to sell it in small tracts and to the highest bidder. It is doing for the Government the best thing under the circumstances. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to make a further remark in regard to the point of order, which by unanimous consent was not pressed on this bill so that it might be considered in the House, as the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. COBURN,] does not seem to be satisfied with the ruling of the Chair. He takes the position the bill provides for perfect safety to the United States, in that it prescribes the land shall not be sold below $1.25 an acre, and also shall be sold in lots of eighty acres each. Now the moment the bill is attempted to be considered in the House, the House may by germane amendments strike out from the bill those safeguards, and provide for selling the land at ten cents an acre and the whole of it in one lot. So the safeguards by which he claims this should be considered in the House may, by germane amendments, be taken away. Therefore it is not to be considered in the form in which the bill is reported whether it is amenable to the point of order or not, but whether any germane amendment thereto will not put the bill in such a condition that, under the rule, it must go for its first consideration to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GUNCKEL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JONATHAN D. HALE.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the petition of Jonathan D. Hale, for relief; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

INSPECTION OF ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. DONNAN, from the same committee, also reported back a bill (H. R. No. 912) to provide for inspection of the disbursements of appropriations made by officers of the Army, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause frequent inquiries to be made as to the economy and propriety of all disbursements made by disbursing officers of the Army, and as to their strict conformity to the law appropriating the money; also to ascertain whether the disbursing officers of the Army comply with the law in keeping their accounts and making their deposits; such inquiries to be made by officers of the inspection department of the Army, or others detailed for that purpose; provided that no officer so detailed shall be in any way connected with the department or corps making the disbursement. The second section provides that the reports of such inspections shall be made out and forwarded to Congress with the annual report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. DONNAN. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in existing laws to prevent this being ordered by the Secretary of War; but this bill proposes to make it a part of his duties to inquire into the economy and necessity of these disbursements. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FIRST RHODE ISLAND ARTILLERY.

Mr. DONNAN, from the same committee, also reported back a bill (S. No. 367) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the State authorities of Rhode Island a certain gun, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, to the proper authorities of the State of Rhode Island a certain gun marked "Battery B, First Regiment Rhode Island Light Artillery, Battle of Gettysburgh," for the purpose of being placed among the archives of the State.

Mr. DONNAN. I presume a single objection will take this bill to the Committee of the Whole, but the House will, I hope, consider it now, as it will require but a moment.

I may say this comes to us on the petition of the veteran organization of Battery B, of the First Rhode Island Light Artillery, asking this gun may be placed in the archives of the State as a valued memento of their brave companions who gave their lives in performance of their duties.

The Secretary of War says the original cost of the gun was $1,000; but now it is of no use except as a memento of the war. It is lying at the navy-yard, near Washington, and has in its muzzle a shot lodged there by the enemy at the battle of Gettysburgh.

I now yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. EAMES. I wish to put upon the record the memorial of Battery B, First Rhode Island Artillery.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Believing that to perpetuate the memory of the brave men who fell in the cause of our common country will instill into the hearts of our children that ardor, patriotism, and courage displayed by their fathers in the hour of need; and that the State of Rhode Island may have within its archives some valued memento of the bravery, not only of its own sons, but of all those engaged in the terrible battle of Gettysburgh:

We, the undersigned, in behalf of the members of the veteran association of Battery B, First Rhode Island Light Artillery, respectfully petition that you will cause to be delivered to them for preservation a certain piece of ordnance, namely, a gun used by them at the battle of Gettysburgh, and now understood to be on exhibition at Washington, District of Columbia, that your petitioners may be the possessors and the State of Rhode Island the custodian of, to us, a valued memento of the bravery of our companions who gave up their lives in the performance of their duty.

DANIEL C. TAYLOR,
President.
JOHN F. HANSON,
Vice-President.
CALVIN W. RATHBONE,
Secretary.
S. G. TUCKER,
J. E. CHACE,
J. BORDON LEWIS,
Executive Committee.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask unanimous consent to make a verbal correction in the bill. I see that the word "infantry" occurs where the word "artillery" should be used.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, that amendment will be made.

Mr. EAMES. I also ask to have put upon record the following letter of the Secretary of War on this subject:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 15, 1874.

SIR: Returning, as requested, the petition of members of Battery B, First Rhode Island Light Artillery, I have the honor to inform you that the gun desired by them is on hand at the Washington arsenal, and is marked "Battery B, First Regiment Rhode Island Light Artillery, Battle of Gettysburgh."

This gun has a 12-pounder shot wedged in the muzzle; and the muzzle itself has been battered by a shot, which tends to hold the shot in the muzzle, and it is of no use to the United States except as a memento of the war.

Its original cost to the United States was about $1,000, and it is for Congress to decide whether or not it shall remain in the custody of this Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. J. K. KELLY, United States Senator.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANK M. KELLY.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1932) for the relief of Frank M. Kelly; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Paymaster-General of the United States Army to pay to Frank M. Kelly, a private of Company F, First Regiment United States Cavalry, $30.39, that amount being the value of certain articles of uniform clothing purchased by him to replace a like number of articles consumed in the fire which destroyed one of the buildings at Camp Warner, Oregon, on the 27th of January, 1873.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that all officers on duty at any point west of a line drawn north and south through Omaha City, and north of a line drawn east and west upon the southern boundary of Arizona, shall be allowed sixty days' leave of absence without deduction of pay or allowances, provided that the same is taken but once in two years. The leave of absence may be extended to three months, if taken once only in three years; or four months, if taken once only in four years.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this bill is an exact copy of one which passed this House during the last Congress, but failed to be passed by the Senate. As the law now stands, there is no power to grant leave of absence to Army officers for a longer period than thirty days in any one year. It must be obvious that for an officer stationed within the district of country embraced by the terms of this bill, the officer being perhaps remote from railroad communication, thirty days barely suffice to enable him to visit his home or friends in the Eastern States and get back again, leaving him no time for the transaction of business. This bill, while continuing the principle of allowing thirty days' absence in each year, allows the officer to cumulate the time if he so desires, so that he may take every two years a sixty-days' leave; or if he wishes leave of absence only once in three years, he may have ninety days. That is the only effect of the bill. I think it a very proper and just measure; and I hope there will be no objection to its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAZARETTO TRACT, DELAWARE RIVER.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1054) to authorize the Secretary of War to lease not exceeding five acres of the tract of land known as the Old Lazaretto tract, for the purpose of erecting thereon a magazine or store-house for the storage of gunpowder.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of War to lease a portion not exceeding five acres of a tract of land situated on the west bank of the Schuylkill River, near its junction with the Delaware River, known as the Old Lazaretto tract, to E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., of New Castle County, State of Delaware, for a period of thirty years, for the purpose of erecting on a portion thereof a magazine or store-house for the storage of gunpowder; the lessees to have the right of ingress and egress by the road now constructed, and authority to build, at their own expense, a pier or wharf to the navigable waters of the Schuylkill River. But if at any time the Government requires said lands for military purposes, the lessees agree to cancel the lease on ninety days' notice and give peaceable possession.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. On behalf of the committee, I move the following amendments:

In line 3, after the word "be," insert, "if he shall deem the same advisable."

In line 4, after the word "lease," insert, "at a rental of not less than $150 per annum."

In line 15 strike out the word "military," before "purposes," and insert the word "any."

In lines 15 and 16 strike out "lessees agree," and insert "Secretary of War shall have the right."

In line 16 strike out "90," before "days' notice," and insert "30."

In lines 16 and 17, strike out the words "and give peaceable possession," and insert these words: "and provided further, that the Government shall not be liable for any damages to the said lessees for or on account of the canceling of said lease."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. There is a report of the Secretary of War on this subject, which I ask to be read. I ask the Clerk to read the letters in order, as they appear in the report: the letter of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., of 22d January, 1874, on page 3; the letter on page 4; and then the letter of the Secretary of War of January 31, 1874.

Mr. STORM. Is this bill subject to the point of order that it should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It would have been, if the point had been made in time.

Mr. STORM. The bill has just been read.

The SPEAKER. And it has been amended in three particulars.

Mr. STORM. We could not tell what the bill was until we heard the amendments reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The time to make the point of order on a bill is when it is read, either by title or in full. If allowed to be discussed or amended, it is before the House for consideration.

Mr. STORM. These amendments came from the committee as part of their report.

The SPEAKER. The amendments reported by the committee are nevertheless voted on by the House.

Mr. STORM. I understand that when a bill is reported with amendments the amendments are treated as if they were part of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Not in this case. The committee reported it with three different amendments, and the amendments have been voted on by the House.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. If no one desires to have the letters read, I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALBRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PATRICK O. HAWES.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1111) for the relief Patrick O. Hawes, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute (H. R. No. 1934) was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

WILLIAM J. SCOTT.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1935) for the relief of William J. Scott, late aid-de-camp on the staff of General Spears; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] whether the cases of the other members of General Spears's staff have been considered by the Military Committee?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. They have not been before the committee as yet.

Mr. MAYNARD. I take this occasion to state that the entire staff of General Spears were in the same condition as this Scott. I had hoped that a bill might come from the committee which would include all the members of the staff. And when the bill comes to be considered in Committee of the Whole I trust the Military Committee may be able to report an amendment that will include the cases of all these officers.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

DEWIGHT DESILVA.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1415) for the relief of Dewight Desilva, of Deposit, New York; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

RESTORATION TO RANK.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R.

No. 1051) for the restoration to their respective positions in the Army of Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry D. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy, all late of the Tenth Regiment United States Colored Artillery, (heavy;) and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

DAKOTA INDIAN-WAR EXPENSES.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 29) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expense incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all other expenses of the volunteer forces of the Indian war of 1862.

The bill was read. It authorizes and requires the Secretary of War to ascertain, or cause to be ascertained, the amount of expense necessarily incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all expenses of the volunteer forces called out to suppress Indian hostilities in the Territory of Dakota in the year 1862, and report to Congress at the next session the names of the persons entitled to relief, together with a statement of the facts and sums upon which such report may be based.

Mr. COBURN. This makes no appropriation. It merely gives the Secretary of War authority to make a report. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House bill No. 296, entitled "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the Territory of Dakota the sum of $28,137.17 for expenses incurred in protecting the frontier settlements during the Indian rebellion of 1862," have had the same under consideration, and make the following report, with the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage:

The committee find that prior to the 30th of August, 1862, and during the summer of that year, the Sioux Indians in Minnesota and Dakota made war upon the whites, perpetrating many outrages, and threatened the entire border in that State and Territory. Thereupon the governor of the Territory issued his proclamation to the citizens of Dakota, ordering all male citizens in the Territory, between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, to at once enroll themselves in companies to be formed for home defense in their respective counties, with such arms as they may have had in their possession. The citizens were directed to assemble and elect their military company officers. They held themselves in readiness to march and engage in active service for the remainder of the year 1862.

The citizens, in pursuance of the proclamation of the governor, organized into five companies, in which were enrolled in all two hundred and sixty-six men, and assembled and elected their officers and prepared hastily-made fortifications for their defense.

In the absence of United States troops, the calling of the militia by the governor, and their enrollment and service, were, in the imminent danger from hostile Indians, the only defense for the people.

The following extract from the governor's message of December 18, 1862, indicates the pressing necessity of prompt and efficient action, without waiting for or obtaining authority or orders from the War Department:

"During the past year our people have suffered from Indian depredations, and the continual fear of being plundered and murdered by the roving bands of lawless savages who have been prowling around our settlements has been a great source of annoyance and alarm to our citizens.

"The murder of Judge Amidon and son, at Sioux Falls, occurring immediately upon the receipt of the first news of the terrible massacre of men, women, and children in Minnesota, very justly alarmed the settlers in that portion of the Territory.

"Knowing their inability to protect themselves against any considerable force of Indians with the small detachment of Dakota cavalry I had stationed there, they have wisely concluded to withdraw to the more thickly settled portions of the Territory, lying upon the Missouri River. After the abandonment of Sioux Falls, the Indians came in and destroyed and burned the town and all the improvements in the surrounding country. Upon the reception of the news of this attack at Sioux Falls, coupled with the news of a great savage war in Minnesota, and the actual presence of hostile bands in the vicinity of our towns, a feeling of general alarm naturally spread throughout the Territory, and many of our citizens removed into Iowa.

"As we had but one military company stationed in the whole country between the Big Sioux River and Fort Randall, and as this company was divided into several detachments, and could render only limited aid to our scattered settlements, I issued a proclamation calling for the organization of the entire militia of the Territory. Finding, however, that the feeling of insecurity was likely to depopulate some of our counties, I dispatched Lieutenant Kellam, a special messenger, to General Blunt, commanding the Department of Kansas, with letters and a requisition for arms, ammunition, and additional troops.

"As no troops could be sent to us immediately, I thought it necessary to call into active service a part of our militia, which would tend to restore confidence and give us protection until United States troops could be stationed in our midst.

"I would recommend that an act be passed authorizing the auditor of the Territory to audit the military accounts of the Territory, and to issue warrants sufficient to defray the expenses connected with subsisting and paying the militia for the time they have been in actual service; and then, when the amount is ascertained, the Legislature memorialize Congress for an appropriation sufficient to refund to the Territory all the expenses incurred by her in maintaining the militia force."

It further appears by a report of Hon. James Tufts, a commissioner appointed January 9, 1863, by the Legislature of Dakota to audit the military accounts of the Territory, of date January 9, 1863, the length of service was fixed at four months as that for which pay should be given. The commissioner also took into account the expenses of the recruiting service; the quartermaster and commissary's department; the expenses for surgeons, hospitals, and incidentals; making a total, for all items mentioned, the sum of $28,137.17.

The auditor of the Territory issued warrants on the treasurer for the sums making the above aggregate.

The action of the governor in calling out the troops, and of the citizens in responding promptly in the emergency, seemed to be all that could be done and the only thing that could be done for the defense of the people of the Territory, since no troops of the General Government could come in time to the rescue, and it seemed madness to wait till the authorities at Washington could be reached and could furnish military aid.

The accounts seem to have been carefully examined by the commissioner, and to have met the approval of the auditor, and are set out in full with the items. The sum seems to be a reasonable and fair one, and we feel justified in recommending its payment.

The committee, in view of their conclusion, report a bill providing that an inspecting officer of the Army be directed to make report upon the claims aforesaid.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now expired.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the fortification bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before that motion is made I desire to say that some two weeks ago, when the Committee on Banking and Currency was called during the morning hour, I reported a bill from that committee, looking to certain modifications in the present banking law, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I gave notice then that on to-day I would endeavor, if I could get the floor and get the favorable action of a majority of the House, to have that bill considered in Committee of the Whole. I feel obliged, therefore, to call the attention of the House to that question. And if my friend from Connecticut is not prepared to give way, and insists upon the consideration of the appropriation bill, the purpose for which I sought the floor of course fails, and I shall not ask to take precedence of him or of his bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I think we can finish the fortification bill very soon; we are half through with it already.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire of the Speaker whether there is any other special order for to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read an extract from the Journal of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be authorized to report House bill No. 825 for the free distribution of printed matter, &c., on Thursday, February 12, and that it be made a special order for that day at half-past one o'clock, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, the general appropriation bills to have precedence.

Mr. DAWES. I have had some conference with the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and it is entirely agreeable to him not to call up that special order until Tuesday. If we go into Committee of the Whole the special order will be first, the tax bill, next the $400,000,000 bill of the Committee on Ways and Means, and after that will come the bill alluded to by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. RANDALL. I think not.

Mr. DAWES. After that.

Mr. RANDALL. No; I think not, for it has not been made a special order.

Mr. DAWES. It comes in after it, if at all.

Mr. RANDALL. O yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. When the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] gets through with his bill I propose to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the tax bill, for the purpose of offering some remarks on that bill. That will clear the way for the next currency bill. If the House will indulge me, the moment the gentleman from Connecticut gets through I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole on the special order for the purpose of submitting some remarks.

Mr. PACKER. I desire to say that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are entirely willing to accommodate the gentleman from Massachusetts if a postponement of it will not lose our special order.

The SPEAKER. If the special order of the gentleman's committee should not be reached to-day it would come up to-morrow, unless the House should vote to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. The Chair will consider it his duty on Fridays, except the third Friday of the month, which is set apart for the business of the District of Columbia, to give precedence to a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. If a majority of the House desire to go into that committee they can do so. It will be for a majority of the House to determine. If a majority of the House desire to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on Fridays, they will always have the liberty of so doing.

Mr. MYERS. Will not the bill of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads come up on Tuesday?

The SPEAKER. Yes; proprio vigore.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope we shall go into Committee of the Whole, and finish the fortification bill; we can do it in half an hour.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say to the chairmen of the Committees on Ways and Means and on Banking and Currency that when their bills—the $400,000,000 bill of the Committee on Ways and Means and the bill of the Committee on Banking and Currency—come up for general debate, I shall propose that all bills referred to the Committee of the Whole on that subject, and I think there are four, shall be regarded as under discussion during the general debate.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I make the point of order that whenever the House is engaged upon questions relating to the order of business there is so much disorder here that gentlemen can hear nothing.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will please resume their seats and be in order. Questions relating to the business in Committee of the Whole are very important, in order that gentlemen may know what will come up.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would say to the House that the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts, by a special order, takes precedence of the bill to which I have referred, and as he has intimated a desire to speak on it to-day, I shall not press a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill to which I have referred; but on Monday next, if I can obtain the floor, I will endeavor to have the matter settled definitely, so that the House will have no difficulty in understanding the order of discussion, and gentlemen can prepare themselves.

The SPEAKER. After the fortification bill, now under consideration in Committee of the Whole, shall have been disposed of, the next special order is a bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means to repeal the stamp duty or tax on matches. The next special order to that is a bill to repeal the tax on bank checks and friction matches. The next to that is a bill to fix the amount of legal-tender notes at $400,000,000. These are the only special orders in the Committee of the Whole, and, as the Chair has heretofore explained, they can be postponed or laid aside only by a vote in the House before going into Committee of the Whole.

The bill of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] from the Committee on Banking and Currency, is not a special order in Committee of the Whole, but the fourth bill assigned to the General Calendar. The bills intervening may be laid aside by a majority vote in Committee of the Whole, while special orders cannot be laid aside by a vote in Committee of the Whole.

In regard to the point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who desires to have all these bills discussed together, the Chair supposes that, so far as general discussion is involved, its range would be quite wide, and there would be no necessity for making an arrangement of that kind. The limit of debate would not be sufficiently stringent to require any special order by the House. But the several bills of course must be considered separately; they cannot be considered otherwise, although one may be moved as an amendment to another.

Mr. KELLEY. I refer only to general debate. I know the House must fix the order in which the bills are to be considered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HUBBELL was granted leave of absence until Thursday next.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I now insist upon my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the fortification bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1037, making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense.

The Clerk read the following paragraphs:

For Fort Foote, Potomac River, Maryland, $20,000.
For Fort Washington, Potomac River, Maryland, $20,000.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Upon conference with the Committee on Appropriations, as the necessity of these appropriations is not pressing this year, I move to strike out the items in relation to Fort Foote and Fort Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For Fort Moultrie, Charleston Harbor, South Carolina, $20,000.

Mr. STORM. I move to strike out the paragraph just read, and I propose also at the proper time to move to strike out the succeeding paragraph in relation to Fort Sumter, Charleston Harbor. I am glad that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] has had struck out, upon his own motion, the appropriations for Fort Foote and Fort Washington. I ask now, for the same reason that I suppose they were stricken out, that the items in relation to the two forts in Charleston Harbor shall also be stricken out. A great deal has been said here in regard to the testimony of General Sherman in reference to these forts.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I wish to say, on behalf of the members from Virginia and Maryland, that owing to the great confusion existing in the Committee of the Whole this morning, the amendment to strike out the appropriations for Fort Foote and Fort Washington was carried, when a great number of members here knew nothing of what was being done. I desire to go back and have another vote on that amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. We cannot go back.

Mr. STORM. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STORM. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then I will make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. However, I will postpone it until the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM.]

Mr. STORM. When the Army appropriation bill was under consideration a few days ago my colleague, [Mr. ALBRIGHT,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and my friend from Virginia who is now making points of order, [Mr. PLATT,] quoted with some considerable approbation the opinion of the General of the Army against the reduction of the Army. But now, when they come here for appropriations for fortifications, and the boot is on the other leg, they commence to find fault with the testimony of General Sherman in regard to these old forts. They pretend to say that he is contradictory, or is not competent to give an opinion, does not possess an adequate knowledge of the facts concerning which he testifies. It seems to me, however, that the Committee on Military Affairs must have considered his testimony very important, because I notice that they have accorded to him thirty-three printed pages in this book of testimony. That the General of the Army is competent to testify concerning these facts I think no one can doubt.

In regard to this Fort Moultrie, he uses a very emphatic expression, and says, "Let it slide." He also says, in regard to Fort Sumter, that he would let it stand as a monument. That seems to be the only use he can see for it. But the Committee on Appropriations has reported to this House an appropriation of $20,000 for each one of these old forts. Now, if the testimony of the General of the Army is good enough to effect the striking out of the appropriations for Fort Foote and Fort Washington, I trust it will be allowed its full force in regard to these old forts in Charleston Harbor, and that we will, as recommended by the General, "let them slide."

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Chairman, the motion to strike out the appropriations for Fort Foote and Fort Washington was made by me, on a suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations, that the work on those fortifications was in such a condition that we might allow them to pass this year without an appropriation. This was the only item in the bill about which the committee had any difference of opinion after hearing the Engineer fully. There was a little difference of opinion in regard to these two forts. Therefore, after a conference this morning, the committee decided to instruct me to make the motion to strike out the appropriation for these two forts.

I now come to the matter specially under consideration — Fort Moultrie and Fort Sumter; and I may consider them together. These fortifications have been standing a good many years. As we all know, they were well tested during the war. There was considerable damage done to them; but still they were retained as fortifications, and by no efforts of gun-ships, or monitors, or any other force, could they be taken. But in the course of hundreds of days of cannonading to which they were subjected, damages were done to a certain portion of the brick walls, by scaling of bricks here and there, until one side had been considerably reduced. Besides this, certain platforms, on which guns were mounted, were damaged. All that it is proposed to accomplish by this appropriation for Fort Moultrie and Fort Sumter is, as stated by officers of the Engineer Department, to smooth off the upper surfaces, to complete the stone-work or mound which has been impaired by incessant firing for months, to replace the damaged trenches, and repair the walls of the magazine. This little appropriation has been designed specially for this purpose. It is not to commence any great or new work, or to make any addition to the works already existing; but simply to restore the damaged portions of this valuable fort. This is the only fort between Fortress Monroe and Savannah, Georgia; and all that is asked is an appropriation to restore the trenches, the sand-work, and a portion of the wall which was broken down by hundreds of days of cannonading. The committee are unanimously in favor of making the appropriation, as are also all the engineer officers, two or three of whom were before us, and several others with whom I have conversed, they having made a personal examination of the work. I think that if General Sherman himself had gone there and seen these walls and trenches broken down, he would have said that an appropriation sufficient to restore them was not unreasonable.

If it were proposed to build any new and expensive works, that would be another question. We do propose to let these fortifications "slide," in the language of General Sherman, except so far as to make the necessary repairs of trenches, embankments, and walls. If they be suffered to remain in their present condition they must be restored ultimately, and the expense by and by will be fourfold what it is to-day. I think, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that in this matter we may safely follow the recommendation of the engineers who have examined these works personally, and who report these repairs to be necessary.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] withdraw his amendment?

Mr. STORM. Yes, sir; with the understanding it shall be renewed.

Mr. RAINEY. I renew the amendment, pro forma. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] will not prevail. The amount asked to keep Fort Moultrie in repair and in proper condition is certainly very small when compared with the amount asked for some other fortifications in the country. If there were no other reason why this appropriation ought to be made, a sufficient one is this: Fort Moultrie has clustering around it a great many historical associations. Its history is intimately connected with that of this Government in its very incipiency, when the American people were struggling for their nationality; and it stands now as one of the monuments of the bravery of the men of that memorable era. I say, sir, that it should be kept as nearly as possible intact, if it be only that strangers may go there and satisfy their curiosity by looking at it, if it be only that the children of the present generation may go and look at a fortification in which their fathers fought for the liberties of this country. I say, sir, this fort should be kept not only in repair but in good condition, so as to command the respect of all who may be disposed to examine it, and of the country at large.

I am well aware that General Sherman in his testimony before the Military Committee said, "Let Fort Moultrie slide." I would not like to suggest the reason why General Sherman may have made that statement; but it must be borne in mind that he was speaking in behalf of the Army; he was not speaking particularly in behalf of the engineers; but he wanted the Army to be kept intact, and he knew very well that if the fortifications were allowed to sink into neglect, the Army must, of necessity, be maintained in a strong condition. If the fortifications of this country be allowed to crumble into the dust, we shall have one broad frontier that will need to be defended by the Army, and which will admit no possibility of a reduction of our military force without the greatest detriment to the nation. Now, while it may be necessary to reduce the Army in the interest of economy to meet the present exigency of national affairs and the requirements of the people, I think we should not forget we are a nation and must command respect abroad. When we begin to neglect our fortifications, to neglect our Army, and to neglect our Navy, we will lose that respect of other nations which we should have if we kept ourselves always prepared for any emergency which might arise.

One moment more. I have spoken about historical associations. There are a great many historical associations clustering about Fort Sumter. Only call to mind what was done at Fort Sumter during the past war of the rebellion. Whether in defense of the southern cause or in defense of the Union cause, the associations of that fortification are intimately interwoven with the history of this Republic. I hope, therefore, this appropriation will be made.

And I might add, before taking my seat, that the appropriations in all of these bills for the Southern States have been comparatively very small. The Southern States have been much neglected in reference to appropriations. I do not like to see curtailments made in the appropriation for these fortifications in the Southern States. In my judgment the appropriations should be made equal, no larger for one section than for another, and no smaller. The people of the North and South have been knitted more closely together by the results of the war. They are now united, never again, I trust, to be separated, and one section ought not to be neglected while another is favored by these appropriation bills. Appropriations are needed in the South, too, and I hope they will be made.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BIERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words on the pending amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. All debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. STORM. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BIERY. I renew, it for the purpose of making a few remarks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desired myself some of these provisions in the bill should be stricken out, but I was laboring under a misapprehension of the facts involved in this question at the time. I made it my business this morning to go to the proper Department for the purpose of correctly understanding all the figures in reference to the necessary fortifications of our harbors in the South. Fort Moultrie is situated in South Carolina, and is one of the landmarks of the late rebellion. It is not only an important point on that account, but is necessary for the proper defense of the harbor of Charleston.

I am aware the General of the Army says "Let it slide," but when we come to actual measurements and figures we find, with all deference to his opinion and his ability, he is not in exact accord with the measurements of the officers of the scientific corps on that point. I find in a number of other instances where the General says no appropriation should be made, the actual measurements by scientific men are directly against his opinion. I think he puts his opinion upon this basis. In his testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs I find the following, on page 24, which I will read:

The CHAIRMAN. With the improvements made in modern artillery can we guard our coasts?

General SHERMAN. Yes, sir; the improvements in modern artillery have been negatived in a great measure by the greater draught of water that ships, carrying large ordnance, have. The channel fleet of England cannot enter a single port of the United States, except, possibly, at Newport, Rhode Island. The vessels which carry these heavy guns cannot approach our coast within range. There is not one such vessel that can come into New York Harbor.

Now, when we turn to the report made by the committee on designs for ships of war in 1872 in the English Parliament we find there are two formidable classes of English ships which can enter almost all of these southern harbors. We find a class of ships, carrying guns of 12-inch caliber and weighing 25 tons, which can pass into most of these southern harbors, because the depth of water is greater than these ships of war need. The Potomac River has a greater depth of water, and so has Charleston Harbor, and so has the Mississippi River; and into all of these waters these formidable English ships of war may come. Yet in reference to all these the General of the Army says no appropriation is needed.

Now, sir, I never felt the blush of shame come more strongly across my cheeks than during the last threatened war with Spain. Although we are forty million people we were thrown almost into a panic when it was rumored that Spain, one of the weakest powers in Europe, was about to invade us with her formidable navy. Our harbors were almost defenseless, as was acknowledged upon this floor, and our Navy was not in a condition to meet the iron-clad navy of Spain, as was also acknowledged upon this floor. Yet now, when appropriations are asked for, they are cut down far below the estimates made by the scientific men employed by the Government for that very purpose. I say let us appropriate the money asked by the men whose duty it is to investigate this subject and determine what is necessary. Let our fortifications be placed in as perfect condition of defense as possible. Let us put our Army and Navy in the best condition. It is true, I know, the General of the Army says we can pick up ten thousand men here and transport them by our unusual railroad facilities from point to point when there is any danger of invasion. But the foes of this country will not fight us in that way. They will send here a powerful fleet which will present itself before one of our large cities, and after having done the greatest damage will run out to sea again before we can transport ten thousand men for the defense of the place.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his amendment that I may renew it.

Mr. STORM. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL. I renew it for the purpose of saying a few words, but intend to vote against it. It seems to me that the action of the Committee on Appropriations in cutting down by this bill the appropriations for various fortifications has been very judicious. Not only has the committee acted wisely in its discriminations, but the Engineer Department of the Army, in its suggestions to the committee, has, in my opinion, done well under the circumstances for the public safety in the interest of economy.

In the locality which I in part represent, and in which I always feel deep concern, as the member from a district should feel in behalf of his especial constituents, we have several fortifications upon the river Delaware and bay. The Engineer Department advised the committee that work might be suspended for a year, or temporarily, on one or two of those fortifications, and that the amount to be appropriated might be expended with better effect on some than on others. And they have pursued the same course in reference to all other points in the country where there are fortifications under construction or repair.

Now, I am sure in saying, as a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and as representing one of the Philadelphia districts, which does me the honor to send me here, that my constituents feel more anxiety at this time about commercial matters than about matters of fortification. It is much more important for the city of Philadelphia that certain improvements should go on in the Delaware River and Bay which would give facilities to commerce so vital to them; that we should go on with the construction of light-houses and the removal of shoals and deepening of the channel, so that our commerce may be accommodated.

Therefore I, as one member of the Committee on Appropriations, though extremely regretting that I could not prevail upon the committee to recommend even a reduced appropriation for continuing the work the coming fiscal year on the improvements on Fort Mifflin, yet I must confess that I am more anxious and concerned about the interests of peace to-day than I am about the interests and requirements of war. I want the progress of the country to be shown, and to advance in the direction of peaceful pursuits, and think it is our best policy, all over the country, that we should improve the facilities of business inland, on our rivers and otherwise, if we can, and let this matter of fortifications go by for a year or two, at least in such localities where we are not in danger.

I think, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that the Engineer Department, in going over the estimates and re-estimating, under the resolution of the House adopted a few weeks ago, have provided sufficiently for the cases where there might be possible danger of attack by a hostile fleet. They have said, in such cases, let us go on with the work; but in localities where there would be no such liability, they have said let us withdraw these particular appropriations and give them for the benefit of other fortifications more necessary to be finished at an early day.

Take, for instance, Fort Mifflin, on the river Delaware. That is so situated that it cannot be reached by a hostile fleet, provided Fort Delaware is well fortified and the battery at Finn's Point, on the New Jersey shore, is completed. In the revolutionary war it took the British fleet three or four weeks to destroy the fort—so that it could not be held—that stood about where Fort Mifflin stands, then called Mud Fort, just as it took weeks to drive an American force of five hundred men from Fort Mercer, on the opposite side of the river, near Red Bank.

Altogether I think the Engineer Department has dealt wisely with the appropriations for forts in that locality, in view of the fact that Congress demanded reduced estimates and an economical expenditure of money.

On the other hand, in the harbor of New York, there are some forts where I think it would be injudicious that the work should be stopped; and others where the cessation can do no harm; and for the same reason, that the appropriations for Fort Delaware and Battery Finn, they being at and below the head of Delaware Bay, and liable to earlier attack in case of war than Fort Mifflin high up the river

Delaware. I am sure I would have been very glad to have seen the work on Fort Mifflin continued. It is near my constituents, and would be a means of securing and saving their property should adversity occur at any time further down the river. I could not succeed in persuading the committee to adopt my views in reference to an appropriation for the fiscal year beginning after the 30th of June next for this fortification; but as reduced appropriations were determined upon, and as no appropriations were to be recommended where the work in the estimation of the Army engineers could be temporarily suspended until we have a fuller Treasury, I will again say that the majority of the committee has acted with conscientious discretion.

Mr. RANSIER. I rise merely to say a word or two, with the permission of the committee, since the amendment proposes to strike out appropriations for important fortifications in my district. I desire to express the hope that the good sense of this House, although I mean no disrespect to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] will lead them to vote against that gentleman's amendment. These appropriations are necessary unless the committee is prepared to have the sea-coast left in a comparatively defenseless condition.

These two points, Mr. Chairman, are important, not only as guarding the line of our sea-coast but as regards the harbor into which, and out of which, pass vast amounts of the commerce of the country. I ask the gentlemen of the Committee of the Whole, who are as well informed, if not better informed, than I am as to the importance of putting these forts in proper condition, to seriously consider this matter. The whole country is interested in this question, and I trust that no false economy will permit gentlemen to vote for this amendment. For when gentlemen propose to cut off from important fortifications the appropriations which are necessary to put them in proper condition, I say they are influenced by a false economy. The country does not want any such economy; and in the name of the country, and in the name of the people of the South, who are especially interested in that section, I ask the committee to vote down this amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Let us have a vote.

The question was taken on Mr. STORM's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following clause of the bill:

For Fort Pulaski, Savannah River, Georgia, $20,000.

Mr. STORM. I move to strike out that clause. I suppose that this is about the last fort I can take shelter in, and if I am routed out of this I will give it up. I know, sir, the difficulty of opposing river and harbor bills and fortification bills; it is so easy to log-roll on bills of that kind. When we have a river and harbor bill before us, we find it impossible to make any successful attack on the bill reported by the committee, because every gentleman has some little stream or river in his district which he wants to take care of. So in reference to a fortification bill. New York and Maine are interested in it, and South Carolina; and we shall find after awhile that in all the sea-coast States there are some little forts that must be looked after, and therefore it is a difficult matter to make a successful attack on such appropriations. But I do wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there are a number of forts which the General of the Army—against whose judgment some gentlemen who never saw an army or a ship set up their opinions—a man who has the interest of the country at heart, says are utterly useless. He says that some of these forts are on rivers that have not half the requisite depth of water to float any iron-clad; and yet the House, without any consideration, blindly votes the appropriations reported by the committee.

Now I ask gentlemen if this is the proper way to legislate? Here we have an opportunity to cut down the bill at least $100,000, and yet the House goes right on voting blindly in accordance with the suggestions of the committee, and against the recommendation of the man who, above all others, understands the subject and knows what is necessary in regard to these old, useless, worn-out forts.

The member from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] says that he wants Fort Sumter to stand as a monument. Well, sir, this is rather a bad time to talk about building monuments. We have commenced one, standing down there on a reservation on the bank of the Potomac, intended to be erected to the memory of the Father of his Country. When that is finished then I will vote with the gentleman from South Carolina to make a monument out of old Fort Sumter.

Now this Fort Pulaski is one of the forts for which General Sherman says he would make no appropriation.

Mr. BIERY. Suppose the Spanish government had sent a war vessel into Charleston Harbor, would the forts now in Charleston Harbor have been able to withstand it?

Mr. STORM. All I have to say about that is, that there is no southern harbor which an iron-clad can enter; and I put that statement against the opinion of my learned colleague from Pennsylvania. He says he is in favor of reduction. Sir, he reminds me of the man in Massachusetts, who was in favor of the Maine liquor law but against its enforcement. In the name of Heaven, why should we appropriate money for six forts which General Sherman says are useless?

Mr. BIERY. Has the gentleman read the testimony of General Sherman on page 112?

Mr. STORM. Yes, I have; I know it is possible for one man to go into one of the Departments and get a letter making one statement, and for another man to go to the same Department and get a letter stating just the opposite.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has several times quoted General Sherman's remark that there are no southern rivers or harbors which a war vessel of an enemy can enter. I ask him if he indorses that assertion as a member of the House, or believes it?

Mr. STORM. If the question is between the judgment of the General of the Army and that of the gentleman from Virginia, I think I would rather take the opinion of the General of the Army.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. That is a good way of begging the question, and the only way in which the gentleman's arguments can be supported. It seems to be his special mission to make an attack upon every appropriation proposed here for the South; but I venture the assertion that if an appropriation was proposed here for a fort standing somewhere in the interior of Pennsylvania, he would be very glad to see it passed. He said that his colleague was like the man in Massachusetts who was in favor of the Maine liquor law but against its enforcement. He reminds me of the gentleman who had a boil and who thought that the best place for that boil to be was on somebody else. [Laughter.] He thinks the best place for retrenchment is in some other man's district, anywhere away from Pennsylvania.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman makes a great mistake when he thinks that the people of the country desire or demand any such false economy as he would have this Congress adopt. I hold in my hand, and would like to have read, a letter received by me this morning from a citizen of this country, who has no interest in politics except that of a citizen, who never had office or asked for one, who lives in the interior of one of our New England States, and reflects the intelligence of the people who live there. I ask the Clerk to read the passage in his letter which I have marked, and I commend the sentiments of that old man, seventy-four years of age, to the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM,] and to other gentlemen who take the same position that he does, in attempting to defeat appropriations for the Army.

The Clerk read as follows:

I take great interest in the proceedings of Congress in reference to the Army. Ever since I was a young man I have watched the proceedings of Congress in relation to the Army. And I have come to the conclusion that there never was an Army of so small a number that rendered their country such important and loyal and faithful service as that of the United States. And there never was one that has been supported so grudgingly by the legislative power. Since I have taken an interest in public affairs, now over fifty years, I have always tried to understand why it was that in every Congress there has been a class of men who, instead of encouraging and trying to make our small Army more efficient, try to dishearten it. I have watched the subsequent careers of many of these men. The Florida war alone will show that this class of men have cost the country more money than would support our present Army for a long time. But in every Congress there has always been a class of men who endeavor to build themselves up by pulling others down, instead of rising by a patriotic and liberal support of their country and its institutions.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STORM. I have a letter on the same subject which I desire to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask for a vote.

Mr. STORM. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KILLINGER. I renew the amendment, and ask to have read the letter which my colleague sends to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

HAMPTON, VIRGINIA, February 11, 1874.

RESPECTED SIR: I beg leave to call your attention, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House, to what seems to me to be a fit subject of reform, in the present condition of the national Treasury. I see by the papers that the officers of the Army are opposed to any reduction of the present force, as detrimental, dangerous, &c. Now, so far as I can judge, there are some four or five hundred men stationed at Fortress Monroe, in this vicinity, and I certainly cannot see the necessity for it. These men are living in idleness, and with some exceptions they are a perfect nuisance to the neighborhood. They support four or five whisky mills of the lowest sort in the vicinity of the fort, and almost nightly disturb the neighborhood with their drunken brawls.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I think that letter has nothing to do with the subject under discussion. It is simply a libel on the officers of the Army, and I object to its further reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAWLS. I desire to oppose the motion to strike out the appropriation in regard to Fort Pulaski. I am not an advocate of the building of these forts; and in a time when there is no necessity for expending the public treasure to keep them up I am no advocate of appropriations for them. I do not know the necessity at this time of keeping any of these forts in existence. But if there is any necessity for any of them, I think that Fort Pulaski, at the mouth of the Savannah River, is justly entitled to the small appropriation reported for it in this bill. I hold in my hand the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury showing that during the last fiscal year there were imports and exports from and to the harbor of Savannah of $46,000,000 which passed under the guns of Fort Pulaski. Does the commerce of the country require protection at any point? If so, why not give it where that commerce exists? We exported from Savannah last year over $45,000,000 and imported nearly $1,000,000, an aggregate of about $46,000,000. All that is asked for the protection of this annual export and importation is $20,000. I trust the report of the Committee on Appropriations will be adopted, and that this item will not be stricken out.

The amendment of Mr. STORM as renewed by Mr. KILLINGER was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Fort Jackson, Mississippi River, Louisiana, $30,000.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding thereto the following:

For Fort McHenry, Baltimore Harbor, $20,000.

Mr. Chairman, not being in the secrets of the Committee on Appropriations, I am not able to say by what calculations they have arrived at the appropriations which they set forth in this bill. But I desire to call the attention of the gentleman having charge of this bill [Mr. STARKWEATHER] to what I have no doubt was an omission of the provision which I propose to have incorporated by my amendment. The total amount appropriated for the defense of the Atlantic coast is $600,000. I call attention to the fact, and I do so not in sectional spirit, that a large portion of that whole amount is for the defense of the coast lines of the States usually denominated New England. I think the amount appropriated to the New England States will reach nearly $200,000.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Allow me to state to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] that General Humphreys came before the Committee on Appropriations, and stated that although in his first estimate he included an appropriation for Fort McHenry, yet the work was in such a condition that an appropriation for it might be withheld without injury. And the general did not ask any appropriation for Fort McHenry in his final estimates, and that item was withdrawn on his suggestion.

Mr. O'BRIEN. As I have already said, it was impossible for me to know why the Committee on Appropriations left out the appropriation for Fort McHenry. I desire further to say, that on yesterday members from the State of New York sitting around me advocated the retention of the appropriations—$124,000—for the defense of New York Harbor, and I have no doubt with perfect propriety, because the interests of the empire city should be protected, no matter at what expense to the Government. That may also be true in regard to the coast lines of New England. And so too the appropriations of $85,000 in behalf of the port of Philadelphia; for the fortifications which are along the line of the Delaware River are appropriate defenses of that port.

But, Mr. Chairman, I had before me merely the report of the Chief of Engineers, which states the fact that Fort McHenry is now being improved in a very important part, and that the appropriation which is called for will be necessary in order that the improvement may be continued and finished in a substantial manner.

There can be no doubt of the fact that, while economy is perfectly proper and should be practiced by all committees and by members in their votes upon these questions, yet as contradictory opinions are held by the General of the Army, the Engineer in Chief, and the distinguished military men who have spoken upon this floor with reference to this bill, it may be that the Engineer in Chief, in recommending the withdrawal of this appropriation from Fort McHenry may have made a very grave error.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that, without Fort McHenry in a condition such as all the forts along our sea-coast should be to defend the ports which they guard against any fleet that may be brought for the purpose of invasion of our shores, Baltimore would be entirely undefended; and the small appropriation which I ask, which is in no proportion whatever to the amount which has been allowed by the committee for other ports inferior in character to Baltimore, is, I think, a proper one and should be sustained.

Now, I call the attention of the distinguished gentleman [Mr. STARKWEATHER] who has charge of this bill to the fact that General Sherman's testimony has been impugned here upon all sides of the House, not with reference to its integrity, but its wisdom. It has been shown that he contradicts himself in his expressions of opinion with regard to these fortifications; and it is perfectly proper to state that the distinguished Engineer in Chief of the Army may have been led into an error in recommending that Fort McHenry should be left in its present unfinished condition in order that the picayune sum of $10,000 or $15,000 or $20,000 may be saved to the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. O'BRIEN, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For Fort Taylor, Key West, Florida, $20,000.

Mr. WALLS. I move to amend by inserting after the clause just read the following:

For Fort Jefferson or Tortugas, Florida, $20,000.
For Fort Poinsett, Florida, $10,000.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to make a speech on this subject. I will simply call the attention of the House to the fact that General Sherman, who seems to be the authority for every proposition that is made here, has recommended that the same amount appropriated for Fort Taylor, Key West, Florida, be appropriated for Fort Jefferson, Florida. The testimony of General Sherman on this subject will be found on page 22 of the published report. I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I will simply say that the bill in this respect is in the form recommended by the Chief of Engineers and his assistants.

Mr. WALLS. My amendment is in accordance with the recommendation of the General of the Army.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense, had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STARKWEATHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPEAL OF TAXES.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed to the consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 262) to repeal the stamp duty or tax on matches.

The bill was read. It provides that from and after the 1st day of January, 1874, so much and such parts of the internal-revenue laws as impose a stamp duty or tax on matches be repealed.

Mr. DAWES having obtained the floor,

Mr. WOOD. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] proceeds, I desire him to state, in order that the House may give him that attention to which his position as chairman of the leading committee of the House entitles him, whether he intends in this discussion to go outside of the immediate question presented by the pending bill.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say what would be an answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] I propose to discuss this bill in connection with the other bill on the Calendar to repeal the stamp tax upon bank-checks; and as these measures involve, in the amount which would thereby be taken from the revenues of the Government, the entire condition of the Treasury, I shall necessarily be obliged to present to the House as well as I may be able the actual condition of the Treasury of the United States to-day. Necessarily, Mr. Chairman, I shall be obliged in the outset to throw myself upon the patience of the House. My colleague [Mr. BUTLER] said the other day that I was in the habit of seizing the House by the ears. I cannot do so to-day; and unless the House is willing to lend me its ear, I shall not be able to get along. I shall indulge in figures not of rhetoric, but figures that are official.

The tax upon matches and upon bank-checks yielded to the Treasury last year $4,100,000, that upon matches $2,500,000, and that upon bank-checks $1,600,000. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has estimated that if the tax upon bank-checks be repealed it will require a refund to those now holding the stamps unused of another $500,000, and at least a like sum, probably more, to those holding unused stamps upon friction matches. So that the question of this repeal involves the taking from the Treasury of $5,100,000.

If the Treasury is in such a condition as to justify this relief to the manufacturers of matches, and to those who use bank-checks, it is exceedingly desirable that it should be done. Therefore it becomes the duty of the Committee on Ways and Means, who are unanimous in this adverse report, to present to the House the reasons for it, and let the House judge for itself whether that relief can be safely granted. And to that end, Mr. Chairman, I propose to state at once what is the actual condition of the Treasury of the United States at this time, as near as figures can make that statement, depending on the estimates of receipts from this time forward to the end of the fiscal year.

The Secretary of the Treasury states in his annual report he had on hand at the commencement of this fiscal year $131,192,028.50 in cash. There were then out on call against the United States, and liable at any moment to be drawn against this sum, as special deposit, legal-tenders held for redemption of certificates of deposit, $31,720,000; coin deposits for which coin certificates were outstanding on call, $39,460,000. The total available funds belonging to the Government, and such as could meet its current expenses, on the 1st day of last July were therefore only $60,002,028.50. It consisted of coin $48,047,402.68; currency $11,954,625.82. This is the amount of cash on hand on the 1st day of July last, the commencement of this fiscal year, available to meet the current expenses of the Government.

The receipts from that day to the first day of this month, estimating five days—because this statement was made up for me five days before the commencement of this month—the receipts from July 1, 1873, to February 1, 1874, were $165,677,972.99.

The receipts for the remaining five months of the year must necessarily be estimated, and are estimated at $116,100,000. I will before I sit down, if the patience of the House is not too much exhausted, give the basis of this estimate.

The total available resources of the Government upon which to draw during this fiscal year are, therefore, $281,777,972.99.

There has thus far been expended during this fiscal year as follows:

On account of the sinking fund, $12,936,450.

On account of appropriations from July 1 to February 1—the last five days being estimated still—$177,174,585.59.

Liabilities of the Government on account of unexpended balances of appropriation, including all possible outstanding appropriations of every kind for which the Government is to-day liable, and for which it may be called upon under any circumstances, $138,381,557.37.

Interest on the public debt, $41,286,661.48; accrued interest due and unpaid, $6,987,477.02; making a total of interest on the public debt of $48,274,138.50, which must be paid before the close of the fiscal year. From this, however, may be deducted the amount of accrued interest which will not be called for during the fiscal year. There has been about the same amount coming over from one year to another of accrued interest not called for. The sum I have already read to you of $6,000,000 came over from last year. Therefore $6,000,000 of accrued interest may be carried over to the next year as not likely to be called for. The estimated expenditures on the interest account will therefore be, with this deduction, $42,274,138.50.

The estimated expenditures on account of sundry indefinite and permanent appropriations are $6,825,000.

The sinking-fund account required by law to be provided is $29,191,369.28. Deducting the bonds already purchased for that purpose, $12,936,450, leaves still further to be provided before the end of the year $16,254,919.28.

The total expenditures, therefore, including all the outstanding appropriations for which the Government is to-day liable, are $393,846,650.74, against available resources of $341,780,001.49. So that if the Government shall be called upon during the year for all of the appropriations which Congress has made of its funds in the Treasury not yet satisfied or covered into the Treasury, there would be at the end of the year a deficit in the Treasury of $52,066,649.25.

But, sir, this does not fairly present the condition of the Treasury of the United States. It only presents its actual condition on paper, charging against its resources every possible outstanding appropriation. But of the appropriations which have been made and are still unpaid, and for which it is liable, there are very many to which there is no probability that the Treasury would be obliged to respond. Previous to 1870 the accounts in the Treasury ran along from year to year, charging whatever appropriations were made for any particular purpose upon one side of the account, and giving credit to payments on the other, from year to year, covering very many years. In that year Congress provided for closing the accounts of the United States once at least in two years, and for covering into the Treasury whatever was left unexpended during that time of any appropriation for any particular purpose. The enactment was as follows:

> That all balances of appropriations which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury, without being drawn against in the settlement of accounts, for two years from the date of the last appropriation made by law, shall be reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Auditor of the Treasury whose duty it is to settle accounts thereunder, and the Auditor shall examine the books of his office, and certify to the Secretary whether such balances will be required in the settlement of any accounts pending in his office; and if it appears that such balances will not be required for this purpose, then the Secretary may include such balances in his surplus-fund warrant, whether the head of the proper Department shall have certified that it may be carried into the general Treasury or not.

Under this provision of law there has been covered into the Treasury the sum of $49,119,887.86. But the Departments have construed this law so that the appropriation shall remain outstanding for two years from the date of the last draft upon it, whatever that may be; so that by this construction they actually retain large amounts.

Now, if gentlemen will turn to their Book of Estimates, which I doubt not every member is familiar with, they will find from page 225 onward a list of all these unexpended appropriations; and they will find in that list appropriations of very large sums, to which every one would say at once, there is no probability that the Treasury will ever be called upon to respond. I have before me now a list of those appropriations unpaid, for specific purposes, where the money cannot be paid for any other than the specific object for which it is appropriated. Happening to open at page 235, I find appropriations of this class made in the year 1871. Take, for instance, the pay of the Army. Every gentleman will see that the Army must have been substantially paid for its services in 1871 before this time. There may be here and there an unpaid claim, but substantially the pay of the Army for the year 1871 is closed. And yet there are standing two and one-half millions of money for which the Treasury stands liable to pay the Army for its services in 1871. Then for pay of two and three years' volunteers for that year there are $12,000,000, and $1,500,000 for bounties for volunteers and their widows and legal heirs during that year. Turning over to the pensions for the same year, there can be no doubt that the pensions for the year 1871 are substantially paid. And yet there is outstanding an appropriation of $9,408,365.23 to pay pensions of 1871. There may be here and there a pension for that year that is not paid, yet every gentleman must see that that item is substantially closed and cannot be considered a draft upon the Treasury. And so with the deficiency in the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the year 1871; there are $2,500,000 in that item. So there are $3,000,000 in the military establishment generally for 1872 outstanding; and the same remark may be made in reference to that.

Now, after a careful revision of all these outstanding appropriations for past years, as well as the Treasury Department and the Committee on Ways and Means are able to estimate how much of these would naturally be still outstanding and must be paid, I have deducted from the outstanding actual liabilities of the Treasury the sum of $72,369,034.39. The items will all be found in the Book of Estimates, beginning on page 225, appendix; and each member can run over that list for himself and see whether this sum of seventy-two millions is a fair and proper estimate of the amount which the Treasury will never be called upon to pay, and which, according to the construction that the Treasury Department puts upon this law or any construction which Congress may put upon it, will go back into the Treasury and be an available fund for the future.

I have before me a statement prepared at the Treasury Department upon which that Department is willing to rely as its statement of the actual condition of the Treasury and its probable liabilities during the year. It is precisely like the one I have already read, with the exception of deducting from the $138,000,000 of actual outstanding appropriations the sum of $72,000,000 not probably required.

The statement is as follows:

July 1, 1873—Cash in the Treasury per Finance Report		$131,192,028.50

You will see that this leaves a balance in the Treasury of $20,302,385.14.

Mr. BECK. Allow me one word. I want to know if the gentleman has a separate tabular statement of these $138,000,000 that he could lay before the House, so that we can see what composes the amount?

Mr. DAWES. The $138,000,000 is contained in the appendix to the Book of Estimates, beginning, as I said, on page 225. Every appropriation for which the Government can possibly be liable under the law is found in the Book of Estimates, commencing at the two hundred and twenty-fifth page.

Mr. BECK. Have you a condensed statement of it, that Congress could look at?

Mr. DAWES. I have not. I suppose the gentleman wishes to know if I have a tabular statement of the $72,000,000.

Mr. BECK. And the $138,000,000.

Mr. DAWES. The $138,000,000 is already here in the Book of Estimates in a tabular statement.

Mr. BECK. But that is so long.

Mr. DAWES. It is long because there are $138,000,000. I do not think it would be possible to put the items for the different Departments in closer compass than they are in this book.

This statement which I make includes the sinking fund; that is to say, the Government will meet every actual liability and every estimated liability which I have given here, will have provided for the sinking fund, and unless there be some mistake in these estimates, it will have $20,302,385.14 at the close of the year. As I have stated, it had $60,002,028.50 not liable to call at the beginning of the year. Of course it is necessary, in order to restore to the Treasury the cash on hand at the beginning of the year, to provide for $39,699,643.36.

By this statement it will be seen that, exclusive of the sinking-fund account, during the first seven months of the fiscal year the expenditures were $11,496,612.60 in excess of the income; and that during the last five months of the same it is estimated that the income will be $988,338.52 in excess of the expenditures; thus showing the expenses for the entire year to be $10,508,274.08 more than the income of the Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, this statement, like the one already made, does not show exactly the condition of the Treasury. Against this $20,302,385 are to be drawn all the deficiencies which have arisen during the year. There have been as yet no deficiency bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations except the naval deficiency bill, which was a specialty, and which has gone into the account already given. But deficiencies are sometimes quite large, and to the extent they may arise this year they will diminish this $20,000,000. That sum cannot, therefore, as yet be definitely stated. I understand that the deficiencies have not yet even been sent to the Committee on Appropriations.

But there will be a deficiency of $1,000,000 in the Indian Bureau. I have estimated the miscellaneous deficiencies, including the new claims and additional pensions that may be passed during the session, at $2,000,000. It should always be borne in mind that from this $20,000,000 will be drawn every appropriation that is made to take effect this year, whether it be for the payment of claims, or any form of an extra allowance of salary, or of extra compensation in any way, or an extra appropriation like that very properly made the other day for the harbor of Buffalo. I have never been in this House when the deficiency bills have fallen below $3,000,000, I think. They may have done so, but I do not now recollect it; and they have gone up to $13,000,000. I have put these deficiencies, including that of the Indian Bureau, at $3,000,000. There is a more considerable deficiency in the Indian Bureau than in any other.

Then there are the awards of the southern claims commission, $600,000; together with what the awards of the Court of Claims may exceed the standing appropriations for that purpose.

But, sir, I have left out of this estimate the claim made by the District of Columbia for expenditures made in this District, being somewhere from three to five million dollars. Last year we passed this act on the 8th of January, 1873:

And provided further, That the said board of public works be, and they are hereby, prohibited from incurring or contracting further liabilities in behalf of the United States in the improvement of streets, avenues, and reservations, beyond the amount of appropriations previously made by Congress, and from entering into any contracts touching such improvements in behalf of the United States, except in pursuance of appropriations made by Congress.

In the face of this provision we are confronted with a claim that has been incurred by the board of public works in this District, since the passage of that act, of from three to five million dollars. I do not care to discuss the propriety of the claim, or its legality, or how the money has been expended, but I desire to say that no calculations of the Treasury Department after the enactment of that law could have contemplated any expenditure by the board of public works of this District for which the Treasury might be liable. Congress may deem it wise to pay the claim, but there could be no calculation by the Treasury Department as to that liability, when Congress had forbidden the incurring of a dollar of such expenditure. I submit, then, that they are justified in their calculations that their cash on hand is not to be diminished by this sum. If, however, this sum shall be paid, it will add to the deficiency I have put in my statistics $4,000,000; making to be deducted from the $20,000,000 some $7,600,000.

There are a variety of other claims which will suggest themselves to members who are more familiar with the details than myself; and while I am now speaking it has been suggested by my friend from New York [Mr. HALE] near me that one of them is the awards made by the mixed commission. I think there is over $1,000,000 there.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Two million dollars.

Mr. DAWES. Two millions, my friend from New York [Mr. HALE] says, and he knows better than anybody else. Then, if we make any appropriation to take effect this year, it draws upon this cash on hand and adds to this deficiency, making it $9,600,000, which will leave but ten million and some odd thousand dollars on hand in the Treasury at the end of a year, the Treasury starting at the beginning of the year with cash on hand to the amount of $60,000,000.

I think it must be very evident to the minds of all that it is not safe for the Treasury to be left with no more than $10,000,000 on hand to meet whatever demands may be made upon it under any sudden emergency that may arise in the absence of Congress. The monthly expenditures of the Government are often more than twice that sum. Nobody would take upon himself the discharge of the duties of Secretary of the Treasury if he must be exposed to the liabilities to which such a condition of things would daily and hourly subject him. Take a single instance. The 1st day of January last Congress had adjourned for the holidays, after having appropriated $13,307,000 of coin to meet the loan of 1858 coming due on that day, if the holders of it did not choose to refund their bonds.

There was coin in the Treasury		$91,479,109 45
It was subject to call as follows:
Overdue interest	$6,987,477 02
Demand notes	79,637 00
Coin certificates	37,543,300 00
Old bonds	10,117,645 26
Interest on same	179,958 35
Interest due January 1	25,500,000 00
Appropriation to meet loan of 1858	13,307,000 00
		93,715,017 63
Making a deficiency in coin on that day, if the calls had been made upon the Treasury to which it was liable, of		2,235,908 18

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether, in his statement of the resources of the Treasury, he has included any part of the $44,000,000 of retired legal-tender notes, improperly called the "reserve fund," a portion of which has already been reissued.

Mr. DAWES. The $44,000,000 reserve, and the use made of it by the Secretary of the Treasury, do not enter into this calculation. I am showing now what has and will become of the $60,000,000 of cash on hand at the beginning of the current fiscal year, $40,000,000 of which was coin. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury, in the administration of its affairs, finding his balance running low, instead of paying out this coin, has paid out this $44,000,000, and kept this coin in the Treasury to answer to so much of the $44,000,000 as had been paid out. And when it ran down so low that he dared not retain coin to answer to every dollar of the $44,000,000 reserve that he paid out, he increased the indebtedness of the Government, as appears in his monthly report, to the amount of about $11,000,000.

Therefore, although I have shown what the balance in the Treasury will probably be at the end of this fiscal year, if you cancel with the coin in the Treasury that portion of the $44,000,000 that has been paid out, yet, in point of fact, the Secretary of the Treasury has retained coin, and in place of it paid currency out of the $44,000,000, with the exception of the $11,000,000 by which he has increased the public debt. During the last month he has been enabled to reduce that increase of debt to about $9,000,000. Therefore the public debt has been increased during the present fiscal year about $9,000,000. It would have been increased to the extent of what has been paid out of the $44,000,000 had it not been for the fact that instead of paying out coin he has retained coin and paid out paper.

Now, the whole value of this statement depends upon two things: upon the reliability of this estimate of receipts for the last five months, and upon the estimates of the expenditures for that time. I need not say more in reference to the expenditures for the balance of the year. The tables of unexpended balances are before the House, and each one can form as accurate a judgment as I have done. It remains for me to give the basis upon which the estimate of receipts for these five months is made.

I have before me a statement of the receipts for each of the last nineteen months from all sources, embracing the whole of the last fiscal year, and the first seven months of the present fiscal year.

The receipts for the first seven months of last year were, from customs, $111,112,384.77, and from internal revenue $67,730,401.67; making a total of $178,842,786.44. During the corresponding seven months of this year the receipts have been, from customs, $93,345,457.76, from internal revenue $57,182,623.09, making a total of $150,527,083.85, showing a falling off in the seven months of this year from the seven months of last year of $28,315,702.59.

Now, the comparison of the receipts for the last five months of the last year with the estimated receipts of the last five months of the present fiscal year is shown by the following: The receipts of the closing five months of last year were $127,611,275.03. It is estimated that the last five months of the current fiscal year will yield $116,100,000, or a falling off of $11,516,275.03. Now upon what basis is that made?

I have here the actual receipts from the internal revenue for the month of January of this year and the month of January of last year; and the showing is that the internal revenue has yielded in the month of January of this year $1,250,000 more than it yielded in the month of January of last year.

I have also the receipts for the first ten days of the present month compared with the corresponding ten days of last year, as follows:

Source.	1873.	1874.
Customs	$4,572,065 09	$4,381,235 89
Internal revenue	2,103,586 59	2,503,214 27
Miscellaneous	736,487 31	40,722 83
	7,412,138 99	6,925,172 99

This table shows an aggregate increase of receipts from customs and internal revenue, although a falling off from other sources of a few hundred dollars:

The internal revenue for the month of January, 1873, was	$8,449,595 04
For the month of January of this year	9,702,255 08
Showing an increase during the month of	1,252,660 04

All the indications which are usually regarded as trustworthy by business men foreshadow such a revival of business as leads the Department to believe that this estimate is a reliable one. The Postmaster-General told me only a day or two ago that during last month he sold eleven million more postage-stamps (official stamps not included) than were ever before sold in the United States in a single month. This increased sale of stamps the Postmaster considered as indicating a revival of business; and he accompanied the statement by the remark that during the depression of the several months preceding, including the months of the panic, there was a very perceptible and marked falling off in such sales.

From these and other indications, taking into view the tables to which I have referred, I think gentlemen will agree with me that we may fairly expect $116,100,000 from all sources during these five months. This, it will be perceived, is $11,516,275.03 less than the receipts of the corresponding months of last year. I have confidence that the deficiency will prove to be less than that sum.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether his estimate takes into account the fact that, as the panic for a time suspended business to a large extent, so the abatement of the financial stringency would probably show a leaping upward beyond the ordinary standard; and that as it would be wrong to take the lowest figures during a financial panic as a standard, so it might be equally a mistake to take the present figures as indicating the income we may fairly calculate upon. May it not be true also that the apprehension of increased internal taxation upon whisky and other articles of manufacture might induce a great many people engaged in manufacturing business to rush forward their operations as fast as possible in order to anticipate the tax? I desire to know whether, in the opinion of the gentleman, any of these causes have been operating.

Mr. BECK. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts resumes, I would like to ask him whether it is exactly fair to compare the first seven months of the current fiscal year with the first seven months of the last fiscal year, and then hold up the fact of the great difference in customs dues received, when the fact was that the 10 per cent. reduction of duty took effect at the beginning of the second month of the last fiscal year, and consequently imports were held back wherever possible to get the benefit of the reduction, and were then rushed in after the reduction took effect, thus swelling the aggregate at that particular time.

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. Chairman, if both my friends had been kind enough to wait a moment they would not have had occasion to trouble themselves with these questions. I was just about to refer to the points suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD;] and then, as soon as I could, I was going to touch upon the matter suggested by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] I was going to say that doubtless there are a great many qualifications which should enter into these estimates, so that we cannot take the exact amount indicated as a just and healthy revival of business, and say with confidence that this measure of receipts could be carried through the year. For instance, the anticipation of an increased tax upon whisky—if my friend from Ohio will permit me to go along with my speech just as if he had not put his question—the anticipation of an increased tax on whisky has no doubt enlarged to some extent the returns from the whisky tax; and the revival of business after such a sudden prostration has no doubt made a rebound that carries business enterprise beyond the legitimate level at which it will maintain itself. All these qualifications (I could not have stated them so well if I had not copied the language of my friend from Ohio) must be taken into account by every gentleman who undertakes to examine these tables and make up his own mind whether any reliance can be placed upon this estimate. The estimate has taken into account all these qualifications that have been suggested. Perhaps, however, a proper allowance has not been made. Each gentleman of the House must examine for himself and form his own judgment upon this matter.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] must remember that the first month of the last fiscal year was under the tariff before reduction, and it is probable that the increased rate that month was about compensated by the holding back of goods to which he alludes for the benefit of the reductions in the subsequent months, and I believe a comparison of the receipts for corresponding months going back several years will show that to be the case.

Now it is fair, and it is due to the administration of the Treasury Department and those responsible for it, to inquire why it is that, beginning this year with $60,000,000 of cash on hand, we shall by this estimate close it with hardly $10,000,000, and with an increase of the public debt, after providing for the sinking fund, while last year we paid more than $43,000,000 of the public debt, including the sinking fund.

On the 1st of May, 1872, we passed a law repealing all duties upon tea and coffee. By this measure we lost during eleven months of the last fiscal year $15,959,778.60 upon tea, and $9,058,685.39 upon coffee, making a total of $25,018,463.99 of revenue. Upon the 6th of June, 1872, we reduced the duty upon a variety of articles, and increased the number of articles upon the free list. By the reduction of duty we lost during the same period $14,346,894.30; and by the placing of additional articles upon the free list we lost more than $5,000,000—in all from those sources more than $19,000,000; making the total reduction of the revenue on these articles $44,367,313.54.

I have before me a list of all articles upon which this reduction was made, and the amount of duty which would have been received during the present year upon these articles. I have also a list of the value of all goods introduced into the country during the fiscal years of 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873, which, if gentlemen will read, they will see what would have been the income from customs to the Government this fiscal year had we not reduced the tariff on the articles we have mentioned. More than $100,000,000 in value of goods have been introduced this present year over and above any other of these years, so that had those duties remained, and that importation continued, not only should we have had in the Treasury to-day this $44,000,000, but we should have the corresponding duties on all of the one hundred million in value of goods which we relieved entirely from taxation.

A MEMBER. In gold?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir; in gold.

I now give the table of these importations:

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, if the gentleman will not disturb my present line of thought.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will not disturb the gentleman if he will allow me to ask him a single question. My question is this, whether it is not an actual fact that the importation of the goods mentioned in the second section of the law of June 6, 1872, for the first seven months of 1872, was 10 per cent. greater in amount than during the first seven months of 1873?

Mr. DAWES. These statistics I have given, to be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, will show all dutiable goods; and gentlemen can see the exact fact whatever it may be.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but merely to call the attention of the House to the fact that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury does show that 10 per cent. more goods were imported under that section in the first seven months of 1872 than in the first seven months of 1873.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BECK. I move the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. DAWES. I am much obliged to the House for its kindness; I know how tiresome this sort of talk is.

By a similar reduction of internal taxes the internal revenue was reduced last year $17,695,456.08. There would be a like loss of internal revenue this year but for the fact that certain changes in the internal-revenue laws have worked so admirably that the loss from this source is less in proportion than that from customs. These reductions of the revenue manifested themselves in part, last year, in the fact that $43,000,000 only of public debt were extinguished, instead of $99,000,000 extinguished the previous year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee will see, and be able to judge as well as I have done, whether the statistics I have made are of any value or not. Nobody can with mathematical certainty say how much of the seventy-two millions will be drawn from the Treasury before the close of the year. If there be any value in these statements, I ask the attention of the House for a few moments to the question whether it would be possible for us in the discharge of our duties to relieve the Treasury. If the House agrees with me that the Treasury is liable, under unforeseen contingencies which cannot always be provided against, to go to protest unless it can have a margin more to be relied on than these ten million dollars, then every gentleman will also agree with me that we do not discharge our duty unless we, as the law-making power, provide some measure by which that margin shall be increased.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, there are but three ways open to accomplish that result. It must be done by increased taxation, by a loan, or by cutting down the expenditures which shall arise between this and the 1st day of next July. Unless some one of these three measures be resorted to, and resorted to in earnest, we, who have the credit of the United States in our keeping, holding only the Secretary of the Treasury and the Administration to the faithful execution of the laws we make, shall have failed in the discharge of our duties. I need not say to this committee it is our duty to resort to that one of these three measures which in the end will be most productive of good to the country and the Treasury, and reflect the greatest credit on us who have that management committed to our charge.

Shall it be by increased taxation? In the beginning, Mr. Chairman, there never has been an instance in the history of the Government when, in time of peace, taxes have been imposed for the purpose of carrying on its current expenses. If to-day we resort to that measure of taxation, it will be the first instance in the history of the Government when we have imposed taxes upon the industries of our country for the purpose of meeting our current expenses. We are emerging by degrees from a system of taxation imposed under an overwhelming necessity, involving the life of the nation, which the people of this country bore patiently, and manfully, and bravely, because of that necessity. When the danger passed away, the burden began to be irksome to the people, and from time to time we have met their restiveness by relief from these burdens as fast as the necessities of the Government would permit.

I am free to say, and I am willing to take my full share of the responsibility for so doing, that in the last Congress we removed these taxes more rapidly than has been justified by the events which have since transpired. It is due to the late Secretary of the Treasury to say, and I here cheerfully give him the benefit of the statement, that in the last moments of the conference committee, in whose report, about to be made, there were four or five millions more of reduction than finally became a law, he urged them to restore at least four or five millions of that intended reduction, insisting that the contingencies of the future were so great and so uncertain that no man could safely assume the responsibilities of Secretary if we cut down the receipts of the Treasury to the extent that we proposed. And after listening to him, in the very last moments before signing the conference committee's report, there were struck off from that report these very measures now pending—the match tax, the stamps upon checks, schedule C of internal revenue, and several other matters. No one at that time foresaw the panic of last September, and the prostration of business which has succeeded it; but its lessons should not be lost upon us.

I am, for one, opposed to any measure of taxation at this time, if there be any other possible solution of the question before us. I cannot, for myself, make up my mind that the people of this country will take upon their shoulders any new burden, unless they shall be first convinced that by no other means can the honor and faith of the nation be maintained. I do not for a moment distrust their ability or willingness to make any new sacrifice that the preservation of either may demand. I feel that nothing would be such a disappointment to the whole industrial interests of this country as increasing the burden of taxation just as they are lifting themselves up out of a depression unparalleled in this country in its suddenness and in its severity. I think we must make up our minds to abandon the idea of increased taxation, notwithstanding the fact that when we took off the $25,000,000 from tea and coffee it did not reduce the price to the consumer of either article one half-penny. I have the prices-current of the country to bear me out that I am substantially, if not mathematically, accurate in the statement, that the whole of the duty taken off was divided between the producer at the one end and the wholesale dealer at the other. If we put on a tax to-day, it is only putting on so much upon the consumer. I am not, therefore, in favor of the reimposition of this tax, though I was opposed to its repeal at the time.

Again, shall we resort to a loan in time of peace and substantial prosperity, with no sudden demand upon the Treasury of the United States? Have we no other way of meeting our current expenses except by borrowing money? Shall we say to the nations of the earth holding our securities, and invited by a standing law of the land to take our bonds at 5 per cent., that such is the condition of our Treasury that we can only pay the interest upon those bonds and meet our currrent expenses by borrowing? I cannot think of anything more fatal to the credit of this nation, not only abroad but at home, than the public announcement here that we are compelled to carry on the daily current and ordinary expenses of this Government by borrowing from day to day by temporary loans, or by whatever name you choose to call the mode of paying our bills by making more of them.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he recollects when he and I first came into the House, in a situation like that which we now have, of the then President indorsing the recommendation of the then Secretary of the Treasury in regard to providing for a deficiency, and if his attention has been called to that method?

Mr. DAWES. Never but once or twice in the history of this Government have we found ourselves, in time of peace, compelled to borrow money to carry on our current expenses. But within my memory in this House, and within that of my distinguished friend at my left, that condition of things arose; and we were compelled to borrow $20,000,000 in bonds having fifteen years to run in order to meet our current expenses, and also to issue Treasury notes to meet the daily demands upon the Treasury. We have been compelled at the present session, in the straitened condition of our Treasury—the fate of every man and nation that borrows to meet his or its current expenses—to pay this loan when we were least able to do so. On the 1st of January we had to pay the fifteen-year bonds which were put upon the market in 1858 to meet the then current expenses of the Government. Our friends on the other side will bear with me, I think, if I say that it was but one of the evidences of the decay of that party which had administered the Government almost exclusively for fifty years. It was one of the evidences of its loosening its hold upon power and of its becoming effete. It was even then dying of dry-rot, borrowing money to meet its current expenses and paying its bills by making more of them. In time of profound peace Mr. Buchanan's administration was unable to meet its current expenses with its current receipts by more than $30,000,000, and it was trusted no longer with power. From that day to this, with the interregnum of Andrew Johnson's administration, this Government has been in our hands; and they upon the other side are watching us from day to day, and now witness the spectacle of our discussing the question whether we shall now, fifteen years after that day, do as they did—fall into the same error, and meet the same fate.

I assume, therefore, that the House will agree with me that there must be some other way out of this dilemma than by either imposing new taxes or borrowing money in the market to meet these expenses.

But this is not all. While we have been reducing our receipts on the one side we have been increasing our expenditures at the other. Listen now to the expenditures of this Government since the present Administration came into power. The first year the expenses of this Government were $322,865,277.80; in 1870 they were $309,653,560.75; in 1871 they were $292,177,188.25; in 1872 they were $277,517,962.67; in 1873 they were $290,345,245.33; the appropriations for the present year sum up $319,652,644.31. In 1870 we reduced our expenditures to $309,000,000 and we paid $101,601,916.88 of the public debt; in 1871 we brought them down from $309,653,560.75 to $292,177,188.25, and we paid $94,327;764.84 of the public debt; in 1872 we brought them down still further to $277,517,962.67, and we paid $99,960,253.54 of the public debt in addition. In 1873 the expenditures ran up to $290,345,245.33, and we paid but $43,667,630.05 of the public debt. This year our appropriations have gone up from $290,000,000, our expenses for the last year, to $319,000,000, without paying one dollar of the public debt.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would ask the gentleman if by accident he has not included in his figures of last year the sinking fund, amounting to $30,000,000, which was not included in the expenditures of last year? I think he will find that he has done so.

Mr. DAWES. I have not done it by accident, but by design. The expenditures for each year, as I have given them, contain the sinking fund, or else I am misled by the Treasury Department itself.

I am inquired of very pertinently by my friend near me, [Mr. BLAINE,] in what items this increase has arisen. The appropriation for public works last year amounted to $14,000,000 in round numbers; it was $20,000,000 this year. That for the naval establishment last year was $18,000,000; this year it is $22,000,000. That for the military establishment was a little over $30,000,000; this year it is $36,000,000; and so with some of the smaller items.

I have shown that we cannot rely upon an increase of taxation, or upon a loan; and I think from what has been said that it is apparent that there are reasons in the very expenditures themselves why we should resort to retrenchment as the only remaining remedy.

Is there any reason in the nature of things in this Government why our expenses should have begun to increase in 1871 and gone up over $20,000,000 in a single year? The war was over eight or nine years ago. It has been the custom, whenever any gentleman has spoken here of increased expenditures, to talk at once about the increase of our territory, and attribute everything to the purchase of Alaska. Well; we did not purchase Alaska last year. It is a good many years since we drew that elephant, and it has brought us in about $200,000 every year net over all expenses. I hope not to hear any more about the purchase of Alaska as a reason why our public expenditures are rising in this ratio.

I am aware how easy it is to talk about economy generally; it costs a man nothing, and is high sounding—delighting the public ear. It is only when you come to particulars that there is trouble. An English statesman once said that the speech that would soonest raise a cheer was that for general economy; and the speech which was most certain to win defeat was one for specific retrenchment. And Bacon, the philosopher, stated it as a general rule, that in generalities there is safety, but in particulars there is danger. But it does no good to talk of general economy, unaccompanied by specific retrenchment.

I know the peril of proceeding further in this line. But I beg members to understand that if I venture further it is not for the purpose of setting myself up as a reformer, or as one who may have any better idea of where reform can best begin than any other member. And I hope no one will take anything I may say about any particular reform except as coming from one who feels that it must commence somewhere, and that it is the duty of each member of the House, and therefore my duty as well as that of every other member, to cast about where best it can be initiated, so that the Government may be brought back to that line of expenditure adopted by this Administration when it came into power, and which has succeeded with unparalleled rapidity in paying off the public debt at the rate of $100,000,000 and in reducing the expenditures somewhere about $10,000,000 each year.

The purchasing power of money to-day is greater than it was five years ago. The extraordinary expenses of the Government to-day are no more than they were in the time of war, when three dollars of our currency were scarcely worth one dollar of the world's standard. The duties incumbent upon the officials who have charge of the administration of public affairs are no more varied, no more conflicting, no more arduous, than they were in the years that have gone by. The country, with the exception of poor Alaska, is no larger than it was then. The machinery of the Government is no more complicated or expensive than it was then.

Does it not, then, become us in candor to inquire seriously whether there may not be fields of reform into which it is our duty to enter earnestly, and see whether we may not put this Government back upon the path of general reduction of expenditures and of the public debt? Take a few points, and see whether there is anything in any of them worth the effort.

Take the permanent appropriations, those which are made in general terms, continuous in effect, and which do not come year by year before the House of Representatives to be scanned and their necessity and magnitude measured. They are appropriations so framed that they come on year by year to be administered, and no report of them is made to us, and no interference or control over them is exercised by us.

Now, how many such permanent appropriations are there of this Government? This last year there were of permanent appropriations $147,361,943.49, over which this Congress has had no control, no supervision, has made no examination of them, nor passed judgment upon the necessity of the expenditure of a single dollar under them. Out of them are paid the entire customs expenditures of this nation, all the expenditures of the loans, of the Printing Bureau, of the Registry Bureau, of negotiating loans, and printing bonds.

There has been placed by law in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the power to take out of the Treasury and pay back money to every individual who thinks that the duties exacted of him at the custom-house are too high, and who pays them under protest. Congress has by law clothed the Secretary of the Treasury with the power of the judiciary to pass upon such questions and repay to the claimant one dollar, or one hundred, or one thousand, or one million of dollars, as shall be the judgment of the Secretary, and to draw his warrant upon the Treasury and to pay it over to the party thus feeling aggrieved, thereby depriving the Government of a judicial construction of the law itself. Within the time that we have been assembled here, when it was our duty to pass upon the construction of the revenue laws of the land, hundreds of thousands of dollars—I cannot tell how many—have thus been paid out on the warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury, a power uncontrolled, save by the known integrity of the Secretary himself.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Is this a new feature, or is it not an old power?

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly it is an old power. I am arraigning no man for originating this power over the Treasury. It has come down to us from other administrations, and we are responsible only for its continuance.

And I might as well now say that I am not here to-day to arraign the republican party, but only to urge it to take hold of the work of reforming and improving old systems and methods which have been inherited, not created, by it. The republican party had its origin in the reform and overthrow of old abuses. It will forget its mission only when it ceases to search them out and abolish them. No other party before it had either the courage or the power to work out reforms within its own organization. It is the glory of the republican party that it probes its own sores and corrects its own errors. It has never waited to be driven from without to a discharge of its duty, but, impelled by the very purpose of its being, it has shrunk from no self-discipline nor hesitated in the application of the most radical reform. It is in this spirit that I speak to-day, arraigning nobody, but seeking, if possible, for better methods of administration than those which the country has out-grown, or experience has proven unwise.

Returning, without further apology for what I may say, to the consideration of permanent appropriations, I am reminded by the gentleman near me of what I ought to have said, that the largest of them all, now amounting to more than $100,000,000, is for the single item of the interest on the public debt. That is a fixed sum; and there can be no discretion in reference to it. It is highly proper that that should be a permanent appropriation, not depending upon a vote of Congress year by year. It is these other appropriations, which, unconscious of their effect, we have permitted to creep into our statute-books alongside of the proper permanent appropriations, that I complain of. I have spoken of one of them. Here is another.

Prior to and up to 1849 the expenses of collecting the whole revenue of the United States were taken out of the gross receipts, and then the balance was paid into the Treasury. You can see at once that Congress would have no kind of supervision over that expenditure. In an act approved February 12, 1850, Congress appropriated for the entire expenses of the customs, in addition to the receipts from storage, cartage, and labor, and including repairs of custom-houses all told, the revenue cutter service, furniture for custom-houses, and occasional sums for new custom-houses, the sum of $2,450,000.

In 1850 California was set up by itself on the principle that had been before prevailing in the country; and they paid over only the net proceeds from that State. But in 1858 California and all the rest were included in a special appropriation which was increased to $3,600,000. This sum was sufficient till the close of the war for the collection of the revenue—for the revenue-cutter service, the purchase of steamers and the building of new ones. In May, 1866, one year after the close of the war, there were appropriated, besides receipts from storage, cartage, and labor, $4,200,000, the proceeds of fines, forfeitures, and penalties, which produced $242,425. In 1867 it amounted to $4,592,000; in 1868, $6,614,369; in 1869, $6,256,000; in 1870, $6,448,000; in 1871, $6,452,000; in 1872, $6,174,000; and in 1873, $8,247,733.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this was not because of the increase of receipts, for when the expenditures were $6,000,000 the receipts were very nearly what they were when the expenditures were $8,247,000. I have the figures showing that in 1873 the receipts were only about $8,000,000 more than in 1866, although it cost us $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 more to make the collection. The precise figures were as follows: In 1866 the receipts from customs were $179,046,000; in 1873 they were only $188,089,522. Was this not because the business was carried on under a permanent appropriation of which we had no supervision, and which we did not review here, a gross sum for the expenses of all the custom-houses and other expenses attending the collection of the revenue?

Now, is there no other place where we can institute any reform? In connection with this matter of collecting the customs, has any gentleman of the House looked at the public documents showing the exact receipts and expenditures at each one of the ports of entry in the United States? Whoever may have done so has found out that at a large number of them the receipts do not pay the expenses; so that if there were no other consideration connected with the question, it would certainly be a matter of economy to close up every one of these ports. But it is known to everybody that it will not do to close a port simply for the reason that the receipts do not equal the expenditures; because closing it and leaving it so would open it to smuggling. Therefore, there must be some intermediate measure of relief. There is no propriety in keeping up the salaries, and official machinery, and custom-houses, where there are not receipts enough to pay the expenses.

I have here a full list of all the ports according to the Finance Report of the Treasury Department, in which will be seen those which do not pay their expenses—ports at which a watchman with a salary of a few hundred dollars a year can prevent smuggling, and will meet all the needs of the Government. The expenses drawn from the Treasury to maintain these twenty-nine ports are $344,685.

The Secretary of the Treasury has relieved himself of all responsibility upon this point by calling our attention to the matter in his report to Congress, and asking us to legislate for the closing of such unnecessary ports of entry as I have described. I have here an extract from his report which doubtless all gentlemen who hear me have read in this connection:

> I invite the attention of Congress to the propriety of reorganizing the customs collection districts on the Atlantic coast, seventy-nine in number.
> The establishment of many of these districts dates back to a period when the conditions determining their importance, relative to the commerce of the country, were entirely different from those existing at the present time. In some the expenses of collecting the revenue exceed the amount collected, and the consolidation of such districts with others may be advisable. At the same time, it must be remembered that the effective administration of the revenue system often requires the services of customs officers at points where few or no duties are collected. The judicious disposition of a force for the prevention of smuggling is indispensable to the collection of the revenue from imports, especially where the extent of coast affords opportunities for the clandestine introduction of dutiable merchandise. I would therefore suggest such action as may lead to a reduction of the number of districts, and a consequent reduction of expenses, without affecting the convenience of importers or the safety of the revenue.

The following is the list referred to in detail, and I call the special attention of members to it:

Statement of the amount of revenue received from customs and the average ad valorem duty; the number of persons employed, their aggregate compensation, and the percentage of cost of collecting the revenue, in each customs district in the United States, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1873.

I cannot leave this branch of the subject without reading a letter received by a distinguished member of this House from a gentleman who was once appointed an appraiser at one of a dozen of these inland ports of entry which we created a few years ago, which this gentleman has kindly consented I might use. I know, however, that about a dozen of these ports were created; and at every one of them, whether a ship ever came within sight of the place or not, we established the whole machinery of a custom-house, and an appraiser with a salary of $3,000. I will now show the fate of one of these poor men by reading the letter to which I have referred:

In 1870 Congress passed a law containing a section making —— and quite a number of cities in the West ports of entry. They had been ports of delivery for years. A previous act had made other places ports of entry, and all of them were about a dozen. In March, 1871, I was appointed appraiser of merchandise at this port. This was a new office at $3,000 a year. When I received that appointment I told ——— ———, who was my Senator, that it was a sinecure. I afterward told the Secretary of the Treasury to the same effect; and a year ago the present month I informed my other Senator that the law should be repealed and the office abolished. Well, an office-holder who expresses such sentiments about his own position is decidedly unpopular in the republican party, [laughter,] and in March last I was removed, for what cause I have never been informed; but I presume the charge was insanity. [Laughter.] There could be no charge of neglect or incompetency, for no officer was ever more faithful and diligent in drawing his salary than I was during those two years, and absolutely there was nothing else to do. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the part I would like to emphasize particularly:

Seriously, while members of Congress are talking about retrenchment and economy, let them abolish these twelve useless offices and save $40,000 per annum, for their blank books and forms (which are not used) amount to a considerable sum. Will you give this subject your attention?

Truly your friend, ——— ———.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. When was the letter dated?

Mr. DAWES. The letter is dated September 22, 1873, during this fiscal year.

Mr. BIERY. Why should not this man return what he has already received to the conscience fund? [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLOGG. It is sixteen instead of twelve.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman a question. What is the name of the writer of that letter; and what propriety is there in his keeping this money without having done any service for it?

Mr. DAWES. I promised the friend who gave me the letter I would not give the name. The other question of my friend from Missouri he can answer better than I can. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I want to know what port is meant by this man in the letter which has been read. I hardly think if he had continued in office he would have written any such letter as that.

Mr. DAWES. I hardly think so. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. If Saint Louis is meant, why, let it fall there?

Mr. DAWES. Very likely, if anybody has been removed at Saint Louis, my friend from Missouri would know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I consider it a little improper to read this letter in the House. If it is a private letter it ought not to be read; and if it be read as a public letter, we certainly ought to have the name of the writer.

Mr. DAWES. The port of entry to which that letter applies is in the list which I have sent to the Clerk's desk to be read. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to say the collection district of Marblehead is in my district, and that I introduced a bill early in this session to abolish it.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague gives me an opportunity to make a personal explanation in reference to that very matter. One morning not long since my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] brought me a bundle of bills, and told me he had to go out of the House and asked that I would introduce the bills for him. I did so, and among them was one to abolish the collection district of Marblehead, and I have had all of my colleague's constituents from that town down upon me ever since. [Roars of daughter.] I am very much obliged to him for giving me this opportunity to defend myself and give him the credit of originating the bill.

Mr. GOOCH. I wish to say that the people in that collection district, and also in the collection district of Salem, desire both shall be incorporated in the Boston district, which will result in a considerable saving of money to the Treasury.

Mr. DAWES. I told you when I came to particulars that I would get myself into difficulty. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I called the attention of the committee to the fact of one large item of increase in the appropriation here. Every gentleman knows to what I allude—the public buildings. So large has the aggregate expense become to the Government that the President of the United States, in his annual message, has specially called the attention of Congress to it. He suggested in that, as well as in one other particular, we could well practice economy by stopping the construction of any of those public buildings not begun, where the public necessity would permit it. He called our attention to the same item to which I have called the attention of the House. In the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury the attention of Congress was called to the fact that very large sums of money would be needed for the completion of buildings begun or authorized. It was also recommended by the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BOUTWELL, that with the exception of putting up hospitals and a building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, for which the money now lies in the Treasury Department, no new work should be authorized.

The President says:

I commend to Congress such economy, and point out two sources where, it seems to me, it might commence, to wit, in the appropriations for public buildings in the many cities where work has not yet been commenced; in the appropriations for river and harbor improvement in those localities where the improvements are of but little benefit to general commerce, and for fortifications.

The Secretary of the Treasury says:

In the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1872 the attention of Congress was called to the fact that very large sums of money would be needed for the completion of buildings begun or authorized, and it was recommended that, with the exception of pavilion hospitals and a building for the accommodation of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the surplus files of the Treasury Department, no new work shall be authorized. Contrary to this recommendation, Congress, while making no appropriation for the building last named, authorized the commencement of seventeen new buildings and the purchase of sites for several others. This legislation, together with the work previously commenced, has imposed an unprecedented and extraordinary amount of labor upon the Supervising Architect's Office, and has rendered it necessary to submit estimates in an aggregate sum much larger than I think should be expended in any one year.

It is highly important to limit the erection of public buildings to such as are imperatively demanded by the necessities of the public service, and where suitable temporary accommodations cannot be provided at a reasonable cost.

The expenditures during the past year were $9,039,698.76, and the balances of appropriations standing to the credit of that office on July 1, 1873, amounted to $14,774,573.

Congress has provided for the erection of twenty new buildings not yet commenced, plans for six of which are now being prepared; sites have been secured for eleven, and negotiations are in progress for the purchase of the remaining nine.

Mr. Mullett, when the revised estimates were called for, had this report submitted to him by the Secretary of the Treasury; and replied as follows:

Should it be decided to commence work on no new building, and to suspend work in all cases where practicable, the estimates for the year ending June 30, 1875, can be reduced from $8,146,449.03 to $2,739,549.28, a reduction of $5,406,899.75; being a reduction of $11,406,899,75 in the present and ensuing fiscal year.

How comes it, sir, that we have thus fallen into this error? Just follow for a few years the history of these appropriations for public buildings. Begin with the New York post-office. We limited it, when we set out, in these words:

Provided, That no part of this sum beyond the sum of $500,000 or any other sum appropriated for this purpose shall be expended until a contract or contracts for the completion of the entire building in conformity with plans to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and Postmaster-General, and at all times under their direction, shall be entered into with the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, and for a sum not exceeding $3,000,000, including all sums already expended for that purpose, except that for the site; and the expenditure of any sum of money in violation of this proviso shall be deemed unlawful.

Now, sir, it might be that it were well when our Treasury was full for us to erect a public building for a post-office in New York at a greater expense than $3,000,000; but Congress fixed that as the limit, and they had the right to fix the limit, and were to be the judges of whether the current expenses of this Government, as well as its necessities, justified a further expenditure than that. But, sir——

Mr. TODD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts give way that I may move that the committee rise? We take a recess to-day so as to have an evening session.

Mr. DAWES. It would be agreeable to me if the gentleman would permit me to get through with what I want to say; I shall only occupy a few minutes longer.

We have already appropriated money in the face of this proviso, thereby making ourselves responsible for the repeal of it, so that we cannot throw off the responsibility upon any administrative officer of this Government. We have already appropriated $5,994,800; and they ask for $1,656,000 more, making about $7,500,000 at the end of this year.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. You changed the plan.

Mr. DAWES. We changed the law. Of course we did. I stated that we changed the law; and you can find the effect of that change in the aggregate of your expenditures, if you desire to search for it.

Mr. MELLISH. You changed the plan of the building.

Mr. DAWES. We changed the plan of the building, and that is not the only building that we changed the plan of. Take the Boston post-office. We put even a stronger limit upon that when we made the first appropriation and after we purchased a site for $500,000, as follows:

And for this purpose there is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, &c.: Provided, That no part of this sum beyond the sum of $250,000, or any other sum appropriated for this purpose—shall be expended until a contract or contracts for the completion of the entire building in conformity with plans to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General, and at all times under their direction, shall be entered into with the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, and for a sum not exceeding $1,500,000, including all sums already expended for that purpose, except that for the site; and the expenditure of any sum of money in violation of this proviso shall be deemed unlawful.

Mark this: "or any other sum appropriated for this purpose"—

Now, sir, we have repealed that provision and have already appropriated $3,268,500. And we appropriated last winter, to purchase one-half of the square upon which this building is erected, after the fire in Boston had cleared the way, another $500,000, and induced the city of Boston to expend $500,000 more and widen the street. We appropriated $500,000 to pay for that half of the block; and when we came to buy it we found it was going to cost us $1,000,000. Now, to get out of this dilemma, in which we pledged our faith to the city of Boston in the act itself that we would buy that square, we have to appropriate $1,000,000. And then it is proposed to enlarge the building to nearly double its present capacity.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman mean to say that there is any obligation resting upon Congress to pay that additional half million dollars to Boston?

Mr. DAWES. I do not mean to say that we are to pay Boston for the half million she expended, but we induced her to spend it in widening the street by appropriating money for that purpose on the condition that she should so widen it. She has fulfilled her part of the condition at an expense of half a million dollars. This is the condition:

And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make no purchase of land under this provision, until the city of Boston shall cause the triangular space between Congress, Pearl, Milk, and Water streets to be opened to the public, and graded and paved at the expense of the city, and shall widen Milk and Water streets, where the buildings have been destroyed by fire, to a width of at least sixty feet.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I think we ought not to make any such concession.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Before the gentleman leaves the Boston and New York post-offices, I wish to ask him whether it is not a fact that every one of these appropriations for expenditures on those two buildings has been made on the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations of this House, with which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have had nothing whatever to do?

Mr. DAWES. It is very likely that is so. I am not settling the responsibility between two committees of the House. The responsibility rests on the House.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I would further ask if the gentleman was not himself the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations during the whole time?

Mr. DAWES. He was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when every one of the limitations I have read was put in.

Take next the case of the city of Saint Louis. The people of Saint Louis wanted a new post-office building. They came to Congress and induced us to pass the bill which I have before me appropriating for the erection of a public building in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri, for the use of the custom-house and other civil offices of the Government, $300,000, with a proviso that the city of Saint Louis should provide a site for the building, and a further proviso that the State of Missouri should cede jurisdiction over it. They came and told us that if we would appropriate $300,000 for a public building there they would give the land on which it should be built. It was the most liberal spirit manifested by any city in the country. But when they saw how we had treated Boston and New York, they came back here and said they were entitled to as good a public building as the city of Boston, because it was no larger than Saint Louis, and was not likely to be half as large ten years hence; and we appropriated after that $1,500,000 for Saint Louis.

Then came Cincinnati, right upon the heels of this, and said that she was as important a city as Saint Louis, and obtained an appropriation which I have before me, for a public building in Cincinnati, of $1,500,000. And a delegation from Cincinnati, like the delegation from Boston, are here to convince Congress that, although that building has not been built, and not one stone turned upon another toward erecting it, yet public necessity demands its instant completion.

Then came Chicago, and by the help of the sympathy felt for it in consequence of the fire she obtained an appropriation of $4,000,000.

I have before me all the appropriations for public buildings made in the years 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, and I will put them in the RECORD. The amounts appropriated during these years run from $5,000,000, $4,000,000, $7,000,000, $4,000,000, to $11,000,000 last year, making a total of these appropriations in these years of over $36,500,000, and for the future prosecution of these buildings alone $7,229,900 are required. [The table appears on page 1457.]

There is a public document lying on your table which shows how much we have appropriated for public works in the several States of the Union within the nine years since the war. It shows what a great people we are. It is a grand and magnificent exhibition of the power of this people, with a debt of $2,700,000,000 upon the nation itself, and twice that sum upon the States and localities, growing out of the war. Emerging from all the burdens incident upon that war, we were able to appropriate in nine years for public works in the several States—from 1865 to 1874—the aggregate sum of $103,294,501.34. That does not include what has been expended in money in these States for roads, canals, and railroads. Nor does it include in the calculation the magnificent domain parceled out for the construction of highways and railways. We have given an empire on the north, a zone through the center of the continent, and principalities all through the Territories of these United States, in addition to these appropriations during the last nine years. We did it for the benefit of public works and the development of the resources of this country. I am not here to belittle or decry or regret these appropriations. I am here to say that when our expenditures for this and other services are rating up beyond our receipts, it is no sacrifice on our part for us to say that we will postpone for the present further expenditures for the erection of these new buildings.

Now, if I may be indulged for a few minutes, I will pass to one or two other subjects.

Four or five years ago attention was called to the fact that there were eight navy-yards on the Atlantic coast, and one upon the Pacific coast, and no system of a wise and broad statesmanship, rising above and beyond the demands of locality, would justify the maintenance of more than two upon the Atlantic coast, and one upon the Pacific. The plan of consolidation could get no hearing in Congress. There was a disposition to sell the navy-yard at Charlestown, but it was to put it with the Kittery yard. There was a disposition to sell the navy-yard at Brooklyn, New York, and bills were introduced for that purpose, but they contained a stipulation that there should be another navy-yard established on the North River. The city of Philadelphia tendered to the United States League Island as a site for a navy-yard in place of the Philadelphia yard, and we accepted the ground; and New London, ambitious, as she had a right to be, tendered an equally eligible site to the Government if it would build a navy-yard there. There was no way to prevent the United States from accepting these gifts, and once launched into building new yards nobody could find any place here to argue that you should consolidate all these yards into one grand one on the Atlantic coast, may be at League Island, may be at Norfolk, with perhaps a naval station in the Gulf; and then another grand one on the Pacific coast. Yet since that time the maintenance of the force in these yards has cost $11,624,495; and now $1,151,740 more is asked this year to keep up the force in them. When in the last Congress we ordered the building of eight sloops of war, incurring the expenditure of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, with our eight navy-yards on this side and one on the other, we directed that one-half of these sloops should be built in private yards. Now, I submit that here is a fair field for reform.

Next take the arsenals. There are twenty-one of them scattered all over the country; and General Sherman—if I may be allowed to quote him—in his examination before the Committee on Military Affairs, said that we needed but four of them, and that all the rest could be abolished and the expense of maintaining them saved. We have learned by the war of the rebellion, not only to move vast bodies of troops from one side of the Union to the other with but little consumption of time, but we have also learned how to move arms, so that there is no necessity, such as existed when these arsenals were established, to keep deposits of arms in different sections of the country, either for the purpose of attack or defense. Abolish all of these arsenals but four, and you will save annually $86,797 in the expense of keeping them up.

One of the grandest features of our whole administration is the pension list. One of the broadest and most charitable and the noblest of all our appropriations is that of $30,000,000 each year for our pensioners. If there is anything we are called upon to keep a supervising care over it is the administration of that $30,000,000—more than the yearly expenditures of this whole Government up to the year

1846. Yet we have adhered to the old system that came down to us from the beginning, when we first established the pensions for our revolutionary soldiers. Is not some new method, more economical and efficient, within the reach of legislation? No one of us has felt it incumbent upon him to look into and see whether there were not some other methods that would keep the eye of the Republic upon the pensioner as well as upon him who dispenses the pension fund. What has been the consequence? We have gone on until to-day we have sixty-eight pension agents scattered all over this land. At first they received a salary of $2,000 a year, and then we raised it to $4,000 a year; and then we put a little clause into a bill requiring every pension agent, each time a pension was paid, to send a voucher to the pensioner, for which the agent was to receive thirty cents. In that way and from that day the compensation of these pension agents ran up more than twofold. I have here the entire list of pension agents and their compensation, and a list of those who under that little clause in the law receive as compensation, the lowest of them, more than a Cabinet minister—many of them from $15,000 to $18,000 per annum.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does not that include clerk-hire?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, that includes clerk-hire. And I understand the clerk-hire and office-rent of the agents who receive $18,000 a year are so enormous that they cannot possibly get along with one penny less than they now receive. And their remonstrance to the inquiry recently made into the cost of pension agencies has been very urgent, on the ground that clerk-hire and office-rent reduce their compensation below what they think it ought to be. I observe that the compensation of the pension agent in Massachusetts, since the allowance of thirty cents for each voucher, has run up from a little over $3,000 to $17,176, $18,411, and $18,124.80. And he is among those remonstrants who say that their clerk-hire and office-rent swallow up nearly all their compensation. Yet I have noticed that as soon as it was found out in Massachusetts that the pension agent was getting $18,000 a year, instead of inquiring whether his compensation could be cut down, it was concluded that it was enough for two agents. So another was appointed, who hired an office in the city of Boston within a few rods of the other one, fitted it up, and obligated himself to pay his office-rent and a new set of clerks out of one-half of this compensation. I went up to the Department and saw there that they were making out a new set of books of the pensioners of Massachusetts to give to this new man who was to have one-half of the $18,000. And it was as much as we could do, all of us here, to get that man thirty miles away from the other one, in order to accommodate some of the pensioners in that State. And I venture to say that if this system is not changed, all these other $15,000 or $18,000 salaries will be divided within the next six months, now that they are made public. Here is the list of the principal ones:

Mr. RUSK. Does the gentleman prefer to give it all to one man, or is it not best to divide it between the two?

Mr. DAWES. Wait until I get through. Is there no other way of distributing this money—the hard-earned pensions of these crippled soldiers and their widows—than by sixty-eight pension agents, at a cost of $481,981 a year? What do they do? The Pension Office furnishes them quarterly with a pension-roll made out here and sends it to their offices. The agents then send from their office in Boston, or any other town where they live, a voucher by mail to the pensioner, who sends it back to them by mail, and they draw their check upon the sub-treasury and send it by mail to the pensioner, and the pensioner goes to the sub-treasury and draws his pension or takes it to some bank for the money. Now, why cannot all that be done here? Instead of sending the pension-roll to the pension agent in Boston, why not send the voucher from here by mail to the pensioner as well as from the city of Boston, and then send to him from here his draft upon the sub-treasury; or you might give him a money-order upon his postmaster. If the postmasters of the land are capable of conducting savings-banks for the benefit of the people, they are at least capable of delivering vouchers to the pensioners in their several towns. In all the small towns there would thus be a personal knowledge on the part of the pension agent of every pensioner within his district, which cannot be had by any pension agent under the present system. By the employment of additional clerks here, whose aggregate salaries need not exceed $20,000, and imposing upon the postmasters in the several towns the duty of either paying a money-order or handing to the pensioner his check, you would save annually this expenditure of more than $400,000.

Turn to the Post-Office itself. Has any gentleman looked at the gross expenses of the Post-Office for the last twenty years? From 1837 to 1850 the gross expenditures of the Post-Office were less than $4,500,000; from 1850 to 1855 they were only $8,000,000; from 1855 to 1866, after the war, they were only $15,000,000; but in 1873 they were $29,000,000. The estimates for the next year are $33,929,912. Now the whole expenses of the Government in 1846 were, as I have said, but a little more than $26,000,000.

I know that the people of the United States demand every possible mail facility, and that the extension of mail facilities contributes to postal receipts, which, however, have not kept pace with the expenditures. The deficiencies are now twice what they were at the period to which I have referred, and were a million more last year than they ever were before.

But there are reforms in the Post-Office which I submit the people of this country will exact of us. Look at the fact that we are running the Post-Office in opposition to the express companies; that we load our mails with dead weight at half the rates at which we would carry printed matter. You can send dead weight under a certain limit for just half the rate at which you can send a book. Almost the entire bullion of the Pacific coast goes through the mails in this manner, instead of being sent by express, because postage is cheaper than expressage.

A friend of mine went into a postal car the other day when the clerk was opening the mail bag. There rolled out of the bag a great iron bolt of a peculiar construction, which, as appeared from the label upon it, was sent from Springfield, Massachusetts, to some large machine establishment in Ohio, and ten cents postage had been paid on it. It was one of the interchangeable parts of a machine manufactured at Springfield. This particular bolt had been broken; and the owner of the machine in Ohio had written to Springfield for the corresponding part, which was made and sent by mail at ten cents postage, instead of being sent by express at a cost of probably five or six times that amount. I only suggest this as one of the many things in which there is room for improvement.

Now, sir, take the Treasury Department in this city. Some twenty-eight hundred persons are employed there; and yet only about four hundred of these are offices created and defined by express statute. There is no law, excepting appropriation bills, creating any of those offices over and above about four hundred. The force of employés in that Department has grown to its present size during and since the war from a real necessity, growing out of the increased labor imposed on the Department. I do not know that there is any one employed there who ought not to be there. But that large establishment has grown up in this way: Some head of a Bureau comes here and satisfies Congress that he needs an additional number of clerks; then we make an appropriation to pay them; and next year we put on another patch, and so on from year to year. Take for illustration one single Bureau, that of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, a position now held by a faithful man, who was once a member of Congress, who has held the position, I believe, for twelve years. When he went there, there were fifteen men under him; and now there are between three hundred and four hundred. The Bureau has grown into its present shape through appropriations entirely. I remember that he used to come here regularly every year and ask for twenty-five, or thirty, or forty additional clerks; he would satisfy us that he needed them, and we would make the appropriation for them. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will remember that at one time when this gentleman was before the Committee on Appropriations this question was put to him: "Has not your long service in the office of Second Auditor suggested to you some change in the mode of doing business there that will contribute to its efficiency and economy?" "O," replied he, "let me take that office and run it as I would a private establishment, and I will take the contract to do it for 50 per cent. of what it costs to-day." Yet he was there at that time asking for more clerks.

The trouble is that from year to year we go on making patches upon a system which needs reorganization. Somebody must take hold of the work of reorganization of the Treasury Department. The Secretaries of the Treasury, from time to time, have been so burdened with their regular duties that they have not felt themselves able to present to us a new system of organization; and we whose business it is to reorganize that Department have waited and waited for reorganization until the system has grown into this huge shape with its present enormous expenditure.

There are other fields that are ripe for the sickle and white for the harvest.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have suggested a single practical remedy. I have indicated places where something ought to be done. That is all I desire, except, if possible, to awaken some degree of earnestness in the pursuit of the only remedy open to us if we desire to maintain our power.

This is not a strange condition of things. It is a natural outgrowth of the system which has come to us through the war. Every thing and every mode of life, private and official, has been lifted to a plane of greater cost and expenditure. Days of simplicity and frugality have passed away.

Why, take this very District of Columbia. The sudden expenditure in this District, during the last three years, of from twelve to fifteen millions by the board of public works, in beautifying this city does not end there. The effect has not stopped with the pleasure it gives us, and those who visit the capital of the nation. It has carried along with it increased expenditure everywhere. It has lifted, not only the District and those who live here, up into another plane of social life, but it has carried official life along with it. It forced upon the last Congress the idea that it was absolutely necessary for them to increase the compensation, not only of officials residing here, but of ourselves on account of the increased expenditures necessary by this state of things. By that single bill there was put upon the last fiscal year $1,900,000, and upon this year about $1,500,000, less what has been paid into the Treasury. We have relieved the Treasury of five-sevenths of that expenditure except in reference to the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court and the salary of the President. But this extravagant mode of life changes all our ideas and begets plans and schemes on an entirely new scale. Its effect upon all who manage public affairs is as marked as it is upon the private individual. It was the cause of the suggestion of erecting, in this city, public buildings for all those Army officers who have quarters here, and for all Cabinet officers and for all Senators of the United States. It was that which suggested the erection of a magnificent university here, embracing West Point and Annapolis and the Coast Survey, and agricultural colleges, and the Agricultural Department, with an endowment of $20,000,000.

It did not stop with the expenditure of the money upon the city. It carried the whole Government into a corresponding official life that has told upon the aggregate of our expenditures. I trust, sir, we shall not shirk the duty it has imposed upon us. I hope no local influence, no consideration of party affiliation or bias or sensitiveness will deter us from that work of retrenchment which will result in putting a balance into the Treasury so large that no just or reasonable apprehension can exist that the faith of the Government shall be dishonored as the inevitable consequence of an excess of expenditures over receipts.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for a moment before he closes. I am sure he would not willingly let a great and serious error of fact go uncorrected into his speech, which in many respects is important to the country, and with the general purpose of which, I have no doubt, a large portion of the House thoroughly sympathizes. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means speaks with such commanding authority, that it is specially important he should found his conclusions on correct data. His criticisms of the course and tendency of appropriations and expenditures were based mainly on the figures which he gave to the House, and showing the aggregate expenditures during recent years, and closing with a statement of the aggregate appropriations for the current year, which will end on the 30th of June, 1874. He stated correctly that the expenditures of the Government, including interest on the public debt and the premium on coin, had been running for the last few years thus: 1870, $309,000,000—I give it in round figures; 1871, $292,000,000; 1872, $277,500,000, and 1873, $290,000,000. Having concluded that table of statements, which I indorse as correct, he then said that the total appropriations for the current year, the year ending June 30, 1874, amounted to $319,652,644.31. At the moment he made that statement I suggested to him he had made the mistake of including in that amount the estimate for the sinking fund. He answered he had done so, but that the amount annually paid on the sinking fund appeared also in the column of expenditures he had given for previous years. I was satisfied the gentleman was mistaken, and I now call the attention of the committee to the proof.

In the first place I turn to the Financial Report for 1873, pages 14, 15, 16, 17, where is given a tabular statement of the expenditures of the Government for each year from 1791 to and including the year 1873 just closed. These expenditures are classified under the heads of War, Navy, Indians, Pensions, and Miscellaneous. These are added together, and form the aggregate sums set down in the column headed "Net ordinary expenditures." The next column shows the annual payments of premium on bonds purchased, and the next shows the amounts paid as interest on the public debt. By adding the net ordinary expenditures to the premiums and to the interest on the public debt we obtain the sums which the gentleman read to us as the total expenditure for the years 1870 to 1873 inclusive; but not a dollar of sinking fund is in these columns. If further proof be needed, I refer to the first and second pages of the same volume. I read from the first page of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for December 1, 1873:

The moneys received and covered into the Treasury during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, were—

Then follow the items of receipts, amounting in the aggregate to $333,738,204.67.

Then on the top of the second page, I read the following:

The net expenditures by warrants during the same period were, for civil expenses, $19,308,521.01; for foreign intercourse, $1,571,362.85; for Indians, $7,951,704.88; for pensions, $29,359,426.86; for military establishment, including fortifications, river and harbor improvements, and arsenals, $46,323,138.31; for miscellaneous civil, including public buildings, light-houses, and collecting the revenues, $52,408,226.20; for interest on the public debt, $104,750,688.44; for premiums on bonds purchased, $5,105,919.99. Total, exclusive of the public debt, $290,345,245.33.

We have, therefore, on that page the declaration of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the text of his report, that the $290,000,000 of expenditures for the last fiscal year did not include payments on the principal of the public debt—did not include the sinking fund.

If the gentleman had added to this sum the $43,392,959.34 which the Secretary says on the fifth page were paid on the principal of the public debt he would have called the total expenditures for the last fiscal year $333,738,204.67, and that sum I am willing to have compared with the $319,000,000 for the current year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see how the gentleman makes up his amount of $319,000,000, as the appropriations for the current year. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] unfortunately followed the example of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who made use of the same figures a few days ago, in an attempt to sustain a charge against the Committee on Appropriations, that they had brought in appropriations and that the House had made appropriations larger than the estimates sent to us. I call the attention of the committee to that point. Here, sir, in the same book which the gentleman from Massachusetts has used, and which also the gentleman from Kentucky used, is a statement of all the moneys appropriated by Congress at its last session; and they amounted to $172,290,700.82. That is the sum total, including all the regular appropriation bills, all relief bills, pension and claim bills, all bills of every sort appropriating money that were passed through the House under the lead of any committees or of any member. Now, in addition to that, the gentleman from Massachusetts, very properly, in order to find the total estimates for the year 1874, turns to the Book of Estimates for last year, which I hold in my hand, and finds that besides the sums appropriated by Congress at its last session there were estimated for under the head of "permanent appropriations," for the year ending June 30, 1864, the sum of $147,361,943.49. This large sum being added to the amount of $172,290,700.82 which Congress appropriated the last session, makes $319,652,144, the sum the gentleman named.

But how are the one hundred and forty-seven millions made up? Turning to page 155 of the Book of Estimates for last year, where the items are given in detail which make up the one hundred and forty-seven millions, I find as estimates for the sinking fund two different sums under two different acts, making together $29,191,369.28; and that twenty-nine millions is a part of the one hundred and forty-seven millions in the permanent appropriations, which, being added to the one hundred and seventy-two millions we did appropriate, make the three hundred and nineteen millions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have shown that the sinking fund was not added in the expenditures which the gentleman from Massachusetts exhibited to show the course of our expenditures in recent years. Of course, I am bound to believe that it is an oversight of his, a mistake which I assume now, as I assumed at the time, he would not willingly make, much less would he intentionally make the impression that Congress at its last session authorized twenty-nine millions more expenditure than it really did.

Now, let me call the attention of the committee to another feature of this subject and I have done. We did appropriate $172,200,700 at the last session; but it was not all for the expenditures of the current fiscal year. The amount includes deficiencies not only for the previous year, but for several previous years. The deficiency bills and the various bills passed through the House for expenditures going into years previous to the current year amounted to $11,143,239; so that more than eleven millions of the total sum provided for by the appropriations of last Congress are not for the expenses of this fiscal year, but belong to other fiscal years.

Unfortunately, too, the retroactive increase of salaries belongs to that list. I join with my friend from Massachusetts in deploring that. A very considerable portion of those deficiencies were war claims which belong to the past, and cannot justly be counted as a part of our annual expenses. Now, deducting the eleven millions of deficiencies, Congress at its last session appropriated a sum of money which, added to its permanent appropriations provided by former laws, amounted to about $272,000,000 for the current fiscal year. We have already increased the sum by the $4,000,000 extraordinary expenditures for the naval service. To that, of course, must also be added whatever deficiencies we shall find necessary to complete the remaining work of this year. But we have appropriated from all sources and for all purposes less money for the current fiscal year than the actual expenditures of the last year. I am quite willing to let the work of the Committee on Appropriations for the last Congress stand the comparison with former years.

In conclusion, I will say that when the legislative appropriation bill is introduced, which I hope will be to-morrow, or at farthest on Monday next, and when we come to its discussion, it is my purpose to address the House somewhat at length in regard to our expenditures and appropriations, and to propose some measures of retrenchment which can be tested by votes. I should not have troubled the House at this time, if I had not deemed it important to correct the error into which the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has fallen. I am sure he will be glad to have an opportunity to make the corrections I have indicated.

Mr. SENER. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SENER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that I am always very glad to be corrected when anything I say needs correction. When I compared the expenditures of last year with the appropriations of this year, the gentleman insisted that the sinking fund was included in the appropriations, but not in the expenditures, of last year. I am satisfied since his statement that I was mistaken and he was correct as far as that item was concerned. I was led into the mistake by the method of book-keeping at the Treasury Department. They have not, for the last four years, separated the sinking fund from the other reduction of the public debt, and they gave me the expenditure for each year and the reduction of the public debt for that year, including the sinking fund, in separate colums, as I gave them to the House. But in the appropriations for this year the sinking fund is included. I, therefore, in comparing expenditures for last year with appropriations for this, should have either added the sinking fund to the expenditures of last year or subtracted it from the appropriations for this year. That sum is $29,000,000, not $43,000,000. When this is done I am happy to say that it nearly wipes out the increase of the appropriations for this year over the expenditures of last year. I am sorry it does not quite do so, for we must add $4,000,000 to the aggregate of appropriations which I gave for the extraordinary deficiency for the Navy for this year. This amount has not been included in any comparison except the one first made by me of receipts with expenditures for this year.

I desire to add that in comparing the expenditures of last year with the appropriations for this, I had no intent to criticise the Committee on Appropriations, for I have said elsewhere, what I now repeat, that the country is more indebted to that committee since the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has been its chairman than to any one I have ever known in this House, for systemizing and curtailing expenditures. In what I have done to-day I have been only following his lead, though with unequal step. Indeed, I am indebted to him for valuable statistics I have used to-day. With the correction of this single error I believe I am substantially correct.

I hold in my hand, not the Book of Estimates, but the Treasury Department copy of every appropriation bill passed last year, and I have on the three hundred and sixth page of it a summary of the appropriations for last year, and also for this year. I went to the Department and obtained this book. I asked them to put under these appropriations the permanent appropriations for last year, and this year, and here are their figures, and I gave them exactly as they gave them.

The gentleman from Ohio, who had the estimate book, says that the appropriations for last year were $306,000,000, while this book says that they were $319,000,000. I sent a special messenger to the Department and asked them why there was that difference. They took the appropriation bills and pointed to the appropriations that make up the difference and that never went into the Book of Estimates. One was an item of $1,000,000 for the southern claims commission; and they pointed out a number of other items which never went into the book of the gentleman from Ohio, and that, they stated, was the reason why this book, which contains a printed copy of every appropriation bill, summed up $319,000,000, while his book only summed up $306,000,000.

Mr. SENER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SCOFIELD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 262) to repeal the stamp duty or tax on matches, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SURVEYS ON THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House the report of surveys recently made upon the Upper Mississippi River, between Minneapolis and Saint Cloud, under direction of General A. A. Humphreys, Chief of Engineers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object, unless the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the House now take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

Mr. POLAND. Before proceeding with the amendments which we have to present to-night, I desire to say a word in regard to the action of the committee. We have gone through with the chapters relating to Congress, and to all the different Departments, and to the public lands. Then come the laws in relation to taxation and the laws in relation to the collection of imports and internal revenue, perhaps a more difficult subject to be treated than any other in the volume. This work of Mr. Durant's, going over the work of the commissioners, was completed in October, and the Committee on Revision of the Laws met here on the 20th of October. We were fully aware of the importance of having the subject especially examined by the Departments, or by men in the Departments who have had experience in the administration of these laws, and therefore the committee took the pains to furnish to each one of the Departments a copy of the revision, and request that they would have all those parts of it that were especially important to them examined. But, so far as we know, the matter was left entirely untouched by every Department, and it was not until after we had made an arrangement for bringing the subject before the House, and a series of evenings for its consideration had been agreed upon, that the Departments awoke to the importance of having these portions of the work examined by officers of the Departments. Of course we were very glad of their aid, especially glad; but it was so late in the day before they began to make these examinations, and, of course, we desired to afford them time to do it, that those portions of the work are not prepared to be submitted, and we are obliged to pass them. I make this explanation to show that it is not the fault of the committee that the presentation of this bill is somewhat desultory, and that we do not present it precisely in order.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I desire to amend the section commencing page 1047, under title 48, for the regulation of commerce and navigation. The first amendment is on page 1049, and is merely verbal. In section 4201, line 1, strike out the word "the,' 'at the end of the line, and insert the word "such;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 4201. Upon the death, removal, or resignation of such president or secretary of any incorporated company owning any vessel, a new register shall be taken out for such vessel.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. On page 1056, section 4217, I move to strike out the words "not required by law to be registered, enrolled, or licensed," and insert "except as otherwise provided in this title under title L;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 4217. In order to ascertain the tonnage of any vessel except as otherwise provided in this title under title L, the surveyor, or such other person as shall be appointed by the collector of the district to measure the same, shall, if the vessel be double-decked, take the length thereof from the fore part of the main stem to the after part of the stern-post, above the upper deck, the breadth thereof at the broadest part of the main wales, half of which breadth shall be accounted the depth of such vessel, and shall then deduct from the length three-fifths of the breadth, multiply the remainder by the breadth, and the product by the depth, and shall divide this last product by ninety-five; the quotient whereof shall be deemed the true contents or tonnage of such vessel. If such vessel be single-decked, the surveyor, or other person, shall take the length and breadth, as above directed in respect to a double-decked vessel, shall deduct from the length three-fifths of the breadth, and, taking the depth from the under side of the deck-plank to the ceiling in the hold, shall multiply and divide in the same manner, and the quotient shall be deemed the tonnage of such vessel.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. On page 1058, section 4225, I move in line 5 to strike out the word "requisites," and insert the word "requirements;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 4225. Whenever any vessel, registered in pursuance of the provisions of the preceding section, shall arrive within the district comprehending the port to which she belongs, the certificate of registry so obtained shall be delivered up to the collector of such district, who, upon the requirements of this title, in order to the registry of vessels, being complied with, shall grant a new one in lieu of the first. The certificate, so delivered up, shall forthwith be returned to the collector, who shall transmit the same to the collector who granted it. If the first-mentioned certificate of registry is not delivered up, as above directed, the owner and the master of such vessel, at the time of her arrival within the district comprehending the port to which she may belong, shall severally be liable to a penalty of $100, and the certificate of registry shall be thenceforth void.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next amendment is on page 1059, section 4229, in line 6, to strike out "but," and insert "provided that," and in line 7 to strike out "must," and insert "shall;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 4229. When any vessel, registered pursuant to any law of the United States, shall, while she is without the limits of the United States, be sold or transferred in whole or in part to a citizen of the United States, such vessel on her first arrival in the United States thereafter shall be entitled to all the privileges and benefits of a vessel of the United States: Provided, That all the requisites of law, in order to the registry of vessels, shall be complied with, and a new certificate of registry obtained for such vessel within three days from the time at which the master or other person having the charge or command of such vessel is required to make his final report upon her first arrival afterward.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. My next amendment is in section 4256.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 4256. The collectors of the customs shall record all such bills of sale, mortgages, hypothecations, or conveyances, and also all certificates for discharging and canceling any such conveyances, in books to be kept for that purpose, in the order of their reception; noting in such books, and also on the bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, the time when the same was received; and shall certify on the bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, or certificate of discharge or cancellation, the number of the book and page where recorded; and shall receive for so recording such instrument of conveyance or certificate of discharge fifty cents; but no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, conveyance, or discharge of mortgage or other incumbrance on any vessel shall be recorded, unless the same is duly acknowledged before an officer authorized to take acknowledgment of deeds.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend near the close of the section by striking out the word "an" before the word "officer" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "a notary public or other;" so that it will read "duly acknowledged before a notary public or other officer authorized to take acknowledgment of deeds." The reason for that amendment is that in some States a notary public is not an officer authorized to take an acknowledgment of deeds. And the language of the statute that we are copying is "a notary public or other officer authorized to take acknowledgment of deeds."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That completes the amendments I have to offer upon this chapter, so far as I am prepared to report them to-night.

Mr. POLAND. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CASON,] my colleague on the committee.

Mr. CASON. I move to transpose section 4411 and section 4412.

The sections referred to were as follows:

SEC. 4411. Any surveyor who shall perform the duties directed to be performed by the preceding section shall be entitled to receive the same commissions and fees as are allowed by law to collectors for performing the same duties.

SEC. 4412. The surveyors appointed for the ports of Cold Spring, on the north side of Long Island, Greenport, and Port Jefferson, all in the State of New York, shall have power to enroll and license vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and to enter and clear, and grant registers and other usual papers to vessels employed in the whale-fisheries, under such restrictions and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary.

Mr. CASON. I move also, besides the transposition, to amend what is printed as section 4411 by changing the phrase "the preceding section" to the phrase "the two preceding sections."

The amendment and the transposition were agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is in section 4413, to change the word "transported" to "imported" in the first line; so that it will read:

SEC. 4413. No merchandise shall be imported, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, from one port of the United States to another port of the United States, in a vessel belonging wholly or in part to a subject of any foreign power; but this section shall not be construed to prohibit the sailing of any foreign vessel from one to another port of the United States, provided no merchandise, other than that imported in such vessel from some foreign port, and which shall not have been unladen, shall be carried from one port or place to another in the United States, &c.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. Is not the word "transported" the proper word, or is the word "imported" the precise language of the statute?

Mr. CASON. The word "imported" is in the original statute, and is the correct word.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is in section 4414.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 4414. The sea-coast and navigable rivers of the United States shall be divided into three great districts: the first to include all the collection districts on the sea-coast and navigable rivers, between the eastern limits of the United States and the southern limits of Georgia; the second to include all the collection districts on the sea-coast and navigable rivers between the southern limits of Georgia and the river Perdido; and the third to include all the collection districts on the sea-coast and navigable rivers between the river Perdido and the Rio Grande.

Mr. CASON. I move to amend the section by changing the word "second" to the word "third" in the middle of the section, and the word "third" to the word "second" in the last clause of the section.

Perhaps some explanation is necessary of this amendment. In volume 3 of the Statutes at Large, on page 409, is an act providing for two districts; but in making the provision they left a gap between the southern limit of Georgia and the river Perdido. Then there was an amendatory act passed, which will be found in the same volume, stating that the first and second districts should remain as they were fixed by the original statute, but providing a third district to fill up the gap. In that way the gap comes second in order, though third in number.

Mr. POLAND. I think the last two clauses of this section should be transposed. As they stand now in geographical order these districts are first, third, and second. It would, however, make the section read very awkwardly to leave it so, and therefore I think it advisable to transpose these clauses, and have these districts named in their numerical order, first, second, and third, instead of their geographical order, first, third, and second. If that is not included in the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CASON,] I will move that amendment.

Mr. CASON. I will modify my amendment so as to include that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. There is another amendment to section 4402. I move to amend, in line 4 of the section, by striking out the words "be liable to a penalty of," and inserting in lieu the word "pay."

Mr. LAWRENCE. What is the expression in the original statute?

Mr. CASON. The word "pay" is used in the original statute.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think the expression "be liable to a penalty of" is better, and more like legal language.

Mr. CASON, (after a consultation with other members of the Committee on Revision of the Laws.) It is thought better, after a consultation with the members of the committee who are here, to leave this section as it is printed. This morning in our committee-room, after consultation, it was thought better to change the language in two sections. But after further consultation the members of the committee who are present think it better to leave it as printed.

Mr. POLAND. I will state, in reference to this matter, that there are all sorts of forms of expression in the statutes. In this particular statute the language is "shall pay $100;" in other statutes the language is "shall forfeit and pay $100;" in others "shall be liable to a penalty of $100;" and in still others "shall pay a penalty of $100." The revisers have adopted in all cases this uniform expression, "shall be liable to a penalty of," &c. If we change the language of this section, we disturb the uniform and good form of expression which the revisers have adopted for the purpose of making the statutes uniform. Therefore the committee decided to let the words stand in this section as left by the revisers.

Mr. CASON. I withdraw my amendment.

The next amendment is in section 4436.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 4436. All steam tug-boats not of the United States found employed in towing documented vessels of the United States plying from one port or place in the same to another, shall be liable to a penalty of fifty cents per ton on the measurement of every such vessel so towed by them respectively, which sum may be recovered by way of libel or suit. This section shall not apply to any case where the towing, in whole or in part, is within or upon foreign waters. Any foreign railroad company or corporation, moreover, whose road enters the United States by means of a ferry or tug-boat, may own such boat, and it shall be subject to no other or different restrictions or regulations in such employment than if owned by a citizen of the United States.

Mr. CASON. I move to amend the last sentence of this section by striking out the word "moreover," after the words "railroad company or corporation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment which I wish to offer is to section 4439.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4439. Every collector, assistant collector, deputy collector, or surveyor, who knowingly makes any record of enrollment or license of any vessel, and every other officer or person, appointed by or under them, who makes any record, or grants any certificate or other document whatever, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this title, or takes any other or greater fees than are by this title allowed, or receives for any service performed pursuant to this title any reward or gratuity, and every surveyor, or other person appointed to measure vessels, who willfully delivers to any collector or naval officer a false description of any vessel to be enrolled or licensed in pursuance of this title, shall be liable to a penalty of $500, and be rendered incapable of serving in any office of trust or profit under the United States.

Mr. CASON. I move to amend by striking out after the words "every collector," in the first line, the words "assistant collector, deputy collector, or surveyor."

Mr. CASON. The next amendment I wish to offer is to section 4444.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4444. Any merchandise on board any vessel which belongs, in good faith, to any person other than the master, owner, or mariners of such vessel, and upon which the duties have been paid, according to law, shall be exempted from any forfeiture under this title.

Mr. CASON. I move to amend by inserting after the word "paid" in the third line the words "or secured."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. I wish to move an amendment to section 4446.

The section was read, as follows:

SEC. 4446. All penalties and forfeitures which shall be incurred by virtue of this title may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered as penalties and forfeitures incurred by virtue of laws relating to the collection of duties, and shall be appropriated in like manner; except when otherwise expressly prescribed.

Mr. CASON. I move to amend by adding to the section the following proviso, which is found in the original act:

Provided always, That if any officer entitled to a part or share of any such penalty or forfeiture shall be necessary as a witness on the trial for such penalty or forfeiture, such officer may be a witness upon the said trial; but in such case he shall not receive or be entitled to any part or share of the said penalty or forfeiture; and the part or share to which he would otherwise have been entitled shall accrue to the United States.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CASON. This brings us to the end of this chapter, and to the commencement of title 50. I have no further amendment to offer.

Mr. POLAND. We have gone over very considerable work to-night, though we have taken very little time. I explained in advance the reason we have been delayed in this intervening work of the tariff and internal revenue. I think we may safely promise that when the evening sessions shall be resumed next week we shall have those sections ready to be presented and proceeded with in order.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to say, a few nights ago, that the committee had omitted in this revision of the laws any act or portion of an act that they considered as functus officio, as having been superseded, so to speak—having no more force as law, because it had been executed. Some three or four weeks ago I had occasion to examine the law with reference to one particular point, that in relation to agricultural colleges, one branch of that subject having been referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. Having occasion to look into the law on the subject, I can find nowhere in this revision any part of the act of 1862 granting public lands to agricultural colleges. There may be an accidental omission, or gentlemen of the committee may have supposed that this act belongs to that class of laws which are regarded as executed, or have fulfilled their functions. But I beg to say to the gentleman from Vermont that the act of 1862 contains conditions with regard to these institutions which it is alleged to-day have never been performed; and the Committee on Education and Labor have that subject now under consideration. So certainly this act would not be included among the class of laws referred to as having been really executed. I desire to know whether an examination has been made to see whether that statute and the amendments to it have been included in this revision, because if they are not it is certainly a great omission. I have looked under the titles "Education," "Agricultural Colleges," "Educational Bureau," and "Public Lands." I cannot find these provisions under any one of those titles. They may be inserted somewhere else in the revision, but I do not think they are.

Mr. POLAND. The particular point to which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] calls attention, in relation to the statutes about agricultural colleges and grants of lands to the States for such colleges, is a subject that has not yet been brought before the committee for examination. The gentleman in whose department of labor that would properly come has not yet reported to the committee; and I have not myself examined to see how the revision may stand in that regard. I am very glad that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has called attention to the point.

The rule that the revisers adopted, and the correct rule as we suppose, is that where a statute is evidently temporary in its purpose and character, and it is entirely clear that the whole object of the statute has been fulfilled, that it has become functus officio, it should not be incorporated in the revision. The other night, as will be remembered, we had an instance in which the revisers had omitted the provision of the statute in relation to supplying trusses. They had omitted it supposing that, in view of the lapse of time since the close of the war, everybody entitled to trusses under that law had received them. But the Committee on Revision of the Laws were of a different opinion, and we therefore incorporated it.

I am very glad that my friend from Pennsylvania has called attention to this matter, because if the committee find that any portion of this statute is still in force, and necessary for any purpose that can possibly arise, we shall incorporate it.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman will see that this is a statute which should not be omitted upon the principles of the revision.

Mr. POLAND. I am very glad that the gentleman has called attention to this matter. We are glad to have anybody call our attention to anything that is wrong in this revision, or anything that has been omitted, because our ambition, if we have any upon this subject, is to make the revision correspond exactly with the law as it is—to incorporate the whole law, and nothing more.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. In order to give as much aid as I can to the gentleman from Pennsylvania making this inquiry, I wish to say, in addition to the statement of the chairman of the committee, that in a part of the revision which we have already gone over will be found the laws relating to the Department of Agriculture. On page 118 is a whole chapter on the Department of Agriculture and the duties of the Commissioner of Agriculture. We have already gone over that part at one of the earlier sessions.

Mr. STORM. But not a single section of the act of July 2, 1862, is here.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will find on page 528, the first whole section on that page, one provision of a general character affecting the land laws. That is also a chapter the House has gone over and disposed of relating to agricultural-college scrip. I understand those two are all he will find in the revision, for the reason, I understand, the grants of land to various persons and purposes, grants to States with their conditions, grants to the Pacific Railroad, for instance, and various railroad grants with whatever conditions are attached to them, were regarded by the revisers of the laws as private statutes so far as this, that they were passed for a particular purpose and having reference to particular corporations and institutions, and do not for that reason come within the scope of the revision. I do not think he will find in the revision any of the statutes containing these grants to agricultural colleges or railroads with any of the conditions attached to them, supposing they would be referred to always as of the nature of private laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. The fact of the omission of that class of statutes has already been somewhat talked over outside of the gentlemen connected with the Committee on Revision of the Laws, and it has been suggested these statutes are not properly to be regarded as private acts, but are in their nature public statutes. They have been so treated by Congress, or at least by the rules of this House, as public statutes. They are in the nature of public statutes, in which rights are reserved to the Government. They are not simply provisions in behalf of the persons to whom the grants are made. It seems to me if they were simply grants of lands to corporations and nothing more, there is no reason why they should go into the general law, but this class of statutes in reference to agricultural colleges has a provision in which the Government as such is interested. There are reservations in behalf of the Government, and they seem in their nature exceedingly important public statutes. In reference to grants to agricultural colleges the Government has general supervision to see that the conditions of the grant are properly complied with. In relation to railroad grants, the condition concerning the free transportation of Government supplies seems to make them, in a striking degree, of public importance.

Mr. STORM. I wish to say just this. I hope the Committee on Revision of the Laws will see the importance of inserting that statute as well as similar ones, because I cannot admit that acts of Congress imposing perpetual conditions upon large grants of lands, conditions which are the very life of the act, should be considered by the committee as mere private acts and now superseded because the grants have probably vested. Those conditions are the very life of the acts. They have to be referred to, and if we wish to ascertain whether these colleges have complied with the conditions of the grants we must have the acts themselves to refer to. The gentleman from Massachusetts certainly will not say a grant of lands to the Pacific Railroad in which is contained a clause requiring a board of directors to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate was such an act as could be justly characterized as a private act.

I think the act of July 2, 1862, or a similar act making grants of lands and imposing perpetual conditions upon grants, is to be regarded as in the nature of a public statute and not as a private act.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I agree, Mr. Speaker, with both of the gentlemen, the one from Indiana and the one from Pennsylvania, in the whole spirit of their remarks. I failed to make myself understood. I think I did not give the exact idea I intended, judging from their remarks since. I have no doubt but this class of statutes are public ones in the sense in which a lawyer uses the phrase. In my own State acts of incorporation are made public statutes expressly, the distinction being they need not be pleaded but may be referred to, and are to be taken judicial notice of by courts in their administration. But it is a serious question, as the gentleman from Indiana will perceive, in regard to the magnitude of this book, whether it is expedient to put in all these various conditional grants which are still in force, are still to be interpreted, on which questions, and important questions, may come up, and in which the Government has rights to protect and enforce.

But has it been customary in the revision of the statutes of the States to include statutes of that character in their body of revised statutes? There is an intention to make this a single volume if possible, which will not be of immense size, and will not need to be divided into several volumes, so that it may be in a convenient form for people using it.

It is noticeable that all statutes relating to the District of Columbia, which undoubtedly are public laws passed by the Congress of the United States, on which the rights of all persons inhabiting this District, or owners of property in it, depend, are not put in this revision at all. The statutes affecting the Territories of the United States are not inserted here, except in so far as the general provisions of law may apply; the specific territorial statutes are not here incorporated for that reason.

Now the committee have taken up the plan of revision which those gentlemen who for six years laid out this work and performed it adopted; and we have not undertaken to revise their plan in order to put into this volume, upon the principle suggested by the gentlemen who have spoken, all the laws which might properly be included in it. To do so would be a labor which the Committee on Revision of the Laws could not perform within a session of Congress. We should have to commence anew from the beginning as commissioners—devoting our entire time to it—the revision and compilation of these laws, if that class of statutes was to be included. I only meant, when I said they were in the nature of private acts, that I understood that was the reason or principle on which the commissioners had not undertaken to include them in the revision which we are now considering and adopting. They will not be affected in their character or in their validity as statutes, because they are not passed upon at all by Congress in this work. If it should be the pleasure of the House to say that this work should not be completed until the committee charged with it have gone over and made a revision of all those classes of laws which might be included in this revision, and which are undoubtedly acts in the legal sense, and important acts, and acts still in force, in that case the committee would have to ask be relieved from attendance on the House and all other duties, ... do not believe we should be prepared to report during the current year.

Mr. STORM. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] allow me to ask him this question, whether he considers an officer nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate and charged with the performance of public duties a public officer?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I should say, Mr. Speaker, that I certainly do in one sense. If he is in relation to a particular corporation I should not suppose that in the sense in which public officers would be included and their duties prescribed in a revision of the general laws it would be expedient to introduce his appointment and the qualifications of his office into the volume. I do not think that that would be done in the revised statutes of any of the States with which I am acquainted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only desire to say that I believe I fully appreciate the view of this matter suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.] It is quite manifest that this volume of laws of general application and of universal use should be kept within reasonable compass. The volume should not be extended so as to be unwieldy. Nor is it desirable that it should be enlarged so as to require more than a single volume. I can readily comprehend that if all that class of legislation which has been referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] and myself were put in this volume it would swell it beyond any convenient or reasonable magnitude. I therefore see, myself, no other mode of avoiding the difficulty to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has referred than that this class of statutes which in their main features referred to corporations, and to grants made by the Government to corporations, shall be embraced in the volume of statutes which are regarded as of more private relations than these general statutes which are of universal application; although, as the gentleman from Massachusetts states, it is very manifest that these statutes are to be regarded as public statutes. In the State in which I reside we have no special legislation. Our laws are all of a general character, and we have never met with such embarrassment as this. I see very well that what occurred to me at the first blush as a matter which might readily be disposed of would swell the work to an unreasonable extent instead of the statutes being embraced in a single volume; so that I think that the plan of compilation adopted by the committee is perhaps the safe one.

Mr. POLAND. The committee have thought that in some instances the revisers held too strictly to that provision of the act under which they were appointed, that they were only to revise those statutes that were of a public and general nature. We had, perhaps, as good an instance of that last evening as could readily be found. The revisers had left out the provisions of the statutes in relation to swamp lands upon the ground that they were not of such a general and public nature affecting the whole country, although they are public laws in the technical sense, that they ought to be incorporated in this revision of the national statutes. The committee on looking at those statutes were of a different opinion; and therefore we made a revision ourselves of the statutes in relation to swamp lands, which you will remember, Mr. Speaker, occupied a considerable number of sections, I think some ten or twelve in all, that were put in as an amendment last night.

Whenever any gentleman thinks that any statute is of such character that it ought to be included, we are very glad to have it called to the attention of the committee, that we may examine it and see whether in our judgment it ought to be brought in.

Now, if nobody desires to say anything further, I will state that the committee hope by our next meeting, on next Wednesday evening, to be prepared to bring before the House the chapters on duties on imports, involving the entire subject of the tariff and the laws for the collection of duties, a subject in which more gentlemen feel an interest than in any other part of our work; and unless we are delayed in our work beyond what we have any reason to believe, we shall bring forward that subject at our next meeting, and endeavor thereafter to proceed in order through the remainder of the volume. I move now that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eight o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 13, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. STOCKTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 1064) to authorize the Secretary of War to lease not exceeding five acres of the tract of land known as the Old Lazaretto tract, for the purpose of erecting thereon a magazine or storehouse for the storage of gunpowder;

A bill (H. R. No. 1932) for the relief of Frank M. Kelly; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

WILLIAM KILBURN.

Mr. STOCKTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and pass a little bill that has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is a bill of a few lines; and the whole object of it is to restore to the list of the Navy a gentleman who under great trial, sickness in his family, resigned. He was only an ensign, and the proposition is not to put him in his old place, but to put him at the foot of the list. I think there can be no possible objection to the bill, and it is important to pass it at once in order that it may go to the other House.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 437) to restore William Kilburn, of San Francisco, California, to the Navy of the United States as an ensign, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President of the United States to restore William Kilburn to the Navy of the United States as an ensign, at the foot of the class of 1870, of which he was a member at the time of his resignation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the letter of Joseph Henry, secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting, in behalf of the Board of Regents, the annual report of the operations, expenditures, and condition of that institution for the year 1873.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that that communication lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And be printed?

Mr. HAMLIN. I was going to submit a general resolution on that subject; and if the Senate will allow me, I will do it in this connection. It is the same resolution in relation to the report of this year that the Senate and House passed on the report of last year:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That twelve thousand five hundred additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1873 be printed; twenty-five hundred of which shall be for the use of the Senate, five thousand for the use of the House, and five thousand for the use of the institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

I suppose, under the rules, this resolution will go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will present a certain resolution passed by the Legislature of Wisconsin, which has been transmitted to the present occupant of the chair, which is very brief, and he will read it:

Resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) That our Senators in Congress are instructed, and our Representatives there requested, to procure the passage of a law reducing the pay of all civil and military officers of the General Government to an amount that shall conform to the duties and labors performed.

This resolution will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an extension of the time in which to construct the Wisconsin Central Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SARGENT. I present to the Senate two volumes containing the signatures of 16,638 persons, residents and citizens of the State of California, in which they ask the Senate to pay attention to the condition of the treaty between the United States and China, and see if by some appropriate legislation, or by a modification of that treaty, the evils which they depict, of an influx of Chinese into this country, may be prevented. The matter is of very great local importance, and perhaps it is to be regretted that it is so local in its character that its importance cannot be fully estimated in other parts of the country.

We have in the State of California, as represented by these petitioners, and I presume that they approximate the truth, some sixty thousand Chinamen. These Chinese do not readily, and perhaps not at all, assimilate with our people. They do not come here to be citizens of the United States; they do not seek to be citizens. With one or two exceptions, out of one hundred thousand, they have never applied to be citizens. By their religion or their superstition their bones, even, are returned to China after their death. They work at very moderate prices. They underbid and undersell all other kinds of labor. They necessarily thereby drive out other laborers, skilled and unskilled. They are exceedingly simple in their requirements for a living, living upon a few handfuls of rice per day. If they have children they do not send them to school. They live in overcrowded habitations upon the streets of our cities, a dozen or twenty of them perhaps in a small room. By this means the health of the cities is imperiled. By this means, also, there are dangers created of conflagrations, which sometimes burst out in the Chinese quarters of our cities and towns, and are very destructive in their effects.

These petitioners, in a most respectful manner, ask the Senate of the United States to consider these matters, and others which they present, and see if some remedy cannot be applied.

I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that California and the Pacific States and Territories are simply the gateway which lets in the influx of Chinese population. We have now, as these petitioners say, some sixty thousand of them. They have reached somewhat further East, carrying, not civilization, as other immigrants bring, but pagan customs through the Territories. By and by, on account of the exhaustless supply of this class of immigrants, or coolies, for many of them are imported as coolies, and our laws do not reach the difficulty and prevent the importation of coolies, the other States will find themselves crowded, as our workingmen are crowded, by the presence of Chinese in great numbers. By and by it will become a national question. Perhaps then it may be too late for the remedy which now might be effectual.

Now, sir, I do not remark upon the humanitarian side of this question. I do not desire especially to dwell upon the consideration that it may be convenient for the overcrowded races of China—overcrowded so much that by a natural law almost they resort to infanticide to keep down overpopulation—to pour themselves upon America. It may be that there is something in that consideration; but there is also much in the other consideration that there should be some means of our own national defense.

We have a Christian civilization. A pagan civilization is necessarily inconsistent with it. Take the State of Iowa, and take out sixty thousand of its white men, those who now give sinew to industry, who cause all the wheels of enterprise to revolve, and put in their place, in the place of the men who maintain churches, and schools, and free institutions, the Chinese, who come here for mere temporary purposes, who do not come here to be citizens, who do not come here to be naturalized or to impart any value whatever to the community in which they reside, but simply to avail themselves of such means as such a community may furnish to get what the miners in my State call "a stake," and return back to their own country, and if they die in the meanwhile, to have their bones sent back; and I ask whether a curse would not be inflicted upon Iowa by such a change?

It is true that we need labor to develop the resources of our country; that it is a pressing necessity upon America that these vast and magnificent resources of ours should be developed; but, sir, it would be better that those resources should be developed more slowly and be developed in the direction of our Christian civilization than that we should squander them or throw them away upon an element which cannot assimilate with us, which never makes the attempt, which, as the snow-ball gathers the snow as it rolls, simply robs us of our material wealth to enrich China, and deprives our willing citizen laborers of the means of subsistence.

Mr. President, I did not intend to remark at the length which I have done upon this subject. I know there is opportunity for good men to differ upon it. For myself I have been very slow in arriving at conclusions upon the matter, and I do not know that I yet have arrived at correct conclusions; but I do know that this question presses with great force upon the Pacific States, and that wise statesmanship can relieve it of some of its evils. In order that this matter may be investigated by the Senate, I ask that these volumes be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of C. Platt, B. W. Brown, and other citizens of Delaware, Ohio, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Susan Vincent, widow of Frederick Vincent, who was administrator of James Le Caze, praying to be repaid a balance of money advanced by the firm of Le Caze & Mallett in aid of the Government during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

He also presented a memorial of wholesale dealers and manufacturers of hats of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of T. J. Chandler and others, citizens of Beaver County, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of Rev. G. W. Crawford, Rev. L. Rice, Samuel Wyatt, and others, citizens of Corunna, Indiana, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of soldiers of the late war, citizens of Indiana, praying for a grant of one hundred and sixty acres of land and for an equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Catharine Middleton, widow of John D. Middleton, praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered by him in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Mobile, Alabama, in favor of a further appropriation for opening the bars in the bay of Mobile; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOREMAN presented additional papers in support of the claim of C. S. Bell; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of J. L. Hutton and a large number of citizens of Indiana, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of S. T. Champion and other citizens of New Jersey, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DENNIS. I present resolutions passed at a meeting held at the city of Baltimore, January 29, 1874, requesting the representatives in Congress from Maryland to use all measures requisite to make the proposed centennial celebration of American Independence in all respects useful, honorable, and national. As the Committee on Foreign Relations have already reported on this subject, I move that the resolutions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying for the establishment of a mail-route from Fergus Falls, via Bass Lake and Monitor Falls, to Perham, on the Northern Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. RAMSEY. I also present resolutions of the State Medical Society of Minnesota, signed by N. B. Hill, M. D., president, and Charles E. Smith, M. D., secretary, in which, among other things, they resolve that the State Medical Society of Minnesota does heartily concur with the American Medical Association in its memorial to Congress in support of a bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army. I move the reference of these resolutions to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER presented a memorial of hat dealers, hat manufacturers, and hat jobbing merchants of Boston, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the extenson of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, in favor of such legislation by Congress as will protect the homestead rights of settlers in that State against the adverse claims of railroad corporations; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Mrs. Martha A. Jones, widow of Oliver P. Jones, of Centreville, Indiana, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, it was Ordered, That Ann Green and Maria Bohner, heirs at law of Colonel Uriah Forrest, have leave to withdraw from the files their memorial and accompanying papers.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that an order be made for the withdrawal of the papers and resolution of the Legislature of Illinois in favor of the passage of a bill providing for an additional district of the United States court in that State, in order that they may be presented to the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has there been an adverse report?

Mr. LOGAN. I will not say for certain, but I think not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there has been an adverse report copies will be retained.

Mr. PRATT. I ask that the following order be made:

Ordered, That Almira H. Thompson be allowed to withdraw her papers relating to her claim as hospital nurse during the war for services and expenditures of money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has there been an adverse report?

Mr. PRATT. The petitioner laid before Congress a claim for a pension, and also for her services and expenditures of money as hospital nurse during the war. The committee reported against her claim for a pension on account of the death of her son, not being satisfied of his death; but as to her claim as a hospital nurse, we did not see that the claim was properly before the committee, and besides it was not sufficiently supported by evidence, and as to that we reported without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered, copies being retained.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I ask that the papers in the case of Joshua Haines, on application for the extension of a patent, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Patents. There was an adverse report formerly, but the case is before us now and we want these papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Sarah Ann Holland be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

INTERRUPTION OF SPEAKERS.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Revision of the Rules, to whom was referred an order submitted on the 26th instant, by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] in which he seeks to prevent the interruption of members while speaking, by providing that no member shall be interrupted while speaking, even with his own consent, unless interrupted on a point of order or to correct an erroneous statement of facts or on account of some personal reference, have instructed me to report unfavorably to the proposed amendment to the rules. By the present rules of the Senate no member, when speaking, can be interrupted except by his own consent, unless it be upon a point of order raised. It is therefore within the power of each Senator to protect himself and to preserve the time to himself while addressing the Senate if he chooses. If he pleases to be interrupted he may be; not otherwise. The committee are unanimously of the opinion that the Senate should not seek to restrict a Senator to that degree that he may not allow himself to be interrupted if he shall choose to be so interrupted, while they are at the same time of the opinion that the practice of the Senate has come to be vicious in the continual interruptions that are made and the improper interjections that are put into speeches of Senators who are addressing the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged, if there be no objection, from the further consideration of the subject.

SWAMP LANDS IN HOLT COUNTY, MISSOURI.

Mr. KELLY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1761) granting certain swamp lands in Holt County, Missouri, to said Holt County for school purposes, to report it back without amendment and ask for its present consideration. The bill is a very short one; but important to a portion of the State of Missouri.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS CREATING POST-ROADS.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Revision of the Rules to report back the resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] on the 22d of last month, and recommend the adoption of the amendment to the rules which he proposes; and that it shall come in as a paragraph after the first paragraph of Rule 30. It is to require amendments to post-route bills creating post-roads to be submitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The Committee on Rules are unanimous in recommending its adoption. I ask that the proposed amendment to the rules be considered now.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the thirtieth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

That no amendment to any bill shall be in order for the creation of a post-road unless such amendment shall have previously been submitted to the consideration of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is to come in as a new paragraph at the end of the first paragraph of Rule 30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONKLING. It is merely to add the words proposed without changing anything in the existing rule?

Mr. MERRIMON. That is all. It changes nothing in the existing rule at all.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 478) relating to certain claims arising from the seizure and conversion by the Treasury Department of certain cotton claimed by individuals; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARPENTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 479) to amend "An act to quiet the title to the lands of the settlers on lands claimed by the West Wisconsin Railway Company;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 480) for the relief of George Burchard, of Greenbush, Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 481) for the relief of Thomas Weeks, of Plymouth, Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 482) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Willamette River, at Salem, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 483) for the improvement of the military wagon-road between Scottsburgh and Camp Stewart, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOREMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 484) to compensate C. S. Bell for valuable and extraordinary services rendered during the war for the suppression of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

STATUE OF JEFFERSON.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution and ask for its immediate adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to consider the expediency of providing for the protection of the statue of Jefferson now in the open air in the grounds of the Executive Mansion, the same being a work of art by an eminent French sculptor.

Mr. President, before the vote is taken I would call attention to the somewhat forlorn condition of that statue, which, take it all in all, is certainly among the very best in the national capital, being the favorite work of the republican French sculptor David d'Angers, known by the town in which he was born, the "black Angers" of Shakespeare. This favorite work has been strangely exposed in the open air, and, not being of a permanent metal, has already suffered. I send to the Chair a letter in reference to it which I have received from Mr. Brown, our own eminent sculptor, who has just placed in our streets the colossal statue of General Scott.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I went this morning, in accordance with your request, to examine the statue of Mr. Jefferson, now standing in the grounds of the President's House, and find it not made of zinc, but of some alloy of copper, but of so base a metal as to render it unfit to withstand the vicissitudes of our climate. I discovered two holes corroded through it, and such other evidences of decay about it as to render it certain that it would require not many years of exposure in the open air to destroy it.

I regard this statue as one of the very best works of art in possession of the Government, and not to provide for its preservation and safety would evince an indifference on the part of the Government to this noble work which I am sure does not exist.

It would seem fitting that this statue should take its place in that venerated Old Hall in the Capitol with the other heroes and patriots whose effigies will from time to time assemble around it.

Submitting these suggestions with great deference and respect, I remain, your obedient servant,

H. K. BROWN.

Hon. CHARLES SUMNER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe there is an especial reason why we should take care of that statue, as it was not purchased by the Government, but I think was a gift from a commodore in the Navy.

Mr. SUMNER. It was from Commodore Levy, and it has been curiously neglected. I think there is no artist visiting Washington who does not select that statue as perhaps the best here, certainly one of the best.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the vacancies in the standing and select committees of the Senate, occasioned by the resignation of Senator Ames and the retirement of Senator Crozier, be filled by the Chair.

ARMY OFFICER IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the consideration of the resolution offered by me on the 10th instant. I gave way yesterday to allow the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to submit some remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate and will be read.

Mr. BAYARD. The resolution, I suppose, need not be read again. As the Senate is aware, it calls for information from the executive department of the Government in relation to the conduct of an officer of the United States Army while on duty in the State of South Carolina, in procuring the passage of bills through that Legislature for his own private gain, and seeking other than professional occupation in that State during the period of his service as an Army officer.

I was prevented the other day, by the expiration of the morning hour, from answering the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] as to some remarks which he made in respect of the individual who is supposed to be the person engaged in what I consider improper practices and highly prejudicial to the public service. I introduced the original resolution on March 1, 1873—not simply to obtain information—in a cautious manner, making no charges, and waiting until the information should be obtained. It was easily obtainable at that time; there would have been little difficulty in ascertaining precisely what had been done, and by whom it had been done. Reference to the public newspapers in the State of South Carolina would have supplied most of the facts. A single telegraphic message from the War Department could have obtained all the information asked for by this resolution, and when obtained, a single word, nay, even a look, from the Executive would have prevented the perpetration of a great wrong upon the people of South Carolina. But, sir, I was disappointed. Not only has the information been withheld, making this supplementary resolution necessary, but nothing whatever has been done in the interim. Part of the wrong I sought to remedy has been accomplished, and the people of South Carolina and their depleted treasury have been simply robbed of the sum of $35,000.

It struck me as a very illogical proposition stated by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, that because this individual had been sent to South Carolina to perform a very unpleasant military duty, one that required him in point of fact to supersede the civil government of that State and take under his control the security of person and property within its limits, he should have met with social ostracism by certain families in that State, and that as a sequitur he should therefore be properly paid some twenty-odd thousand dollars out of the Treasury of that State as a solatium for the alleged wounds to his feelings and those of his family; so that—

The jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that honor feels.

It is an odd proposition to be gravely advanced by the Senator.

But one thing let me say in regard to what I have several times heard complained of on this floor. The questions of social intercourse and social relations are not governed and never will be governed by statute law. They are not governed, and never were and never will be governed, by coercion in any shape. Social intercourse is controlled by human sympathies; sympathies of taste, coincidences of education and of culture, sympathies of feeling, sympathies of occupation, sympathies in joy, and, deepest of all, sympathies in sorrow. All these things in their way control the social intercourse of men, and no law of Congress, no fiat of any autocrat, civil or military, can ever change this truth. It seems strange to me to hear these complaints in the Senate of the social ostracism of officers of the Army of the United States, and of citizens from the Northern States going to the South, when even the dull intellect of that inimitable idiot, Dundreary, found out the great rule that "birds of a feather will flock together." Even he discovered that; and yet it seems that Senators have not yet discovered it.

Now, Mr. President, there are many reasons, if Senators will but reflect upon them, why the hospitality of the South is not what it once was. There are many sad reasons for it. The hospitality of that region of our country was one of its glories. It was one of its chief and most delightful virtues. No man ever tasted of it but would wish again to renew it. But many things are needed to make it possible. In the first place, there must be the question of sympathy between the host and his guest; mutual good will is a prime necessity; then there is required some degree of pecuniary means wherewith to exercise it. The hearts of the southern people are as generous and as warm as ever, but their means and opportunities for hospitality and generosity have been sadly curtailed and destroyed by the war that has wasted the region where their homes are, and uprooted their system of domestic service and menial labor. Many, many are the proud, generous, and sensitive men and women of that country whose doors are closed simply from sheer want, barred by poverty; and they are too proud to have that poverty inspected by cold and unfriendly eyes. Let those who would criticise the absence of that free and bountiful hospitality for which in other and happier days they were renowned remember what has caused it in so many cases to disappear.

Why, sir, the other day a gentleman from New England, whose home is now in Carolina, and who feels a deep interest in the people of that State, desired to have a convention of the property-holders, or holders of the remnant of the property that is left after taxation and war in that State, that they might consider how they should relieve themselves from the confiscation that their estates were being subjected to at the hands of their rulers. He sent letters to the various tax-payers in the State, and among others to a gentleman who had been the governor of the State, whose name for obvious reasons I do not mention in public, but who had been a man of great wealth prior to the war, of high character, well known and esteemed everywhere. When that gentleman replied to the invitation to join in this convention he was compelled to reply that, despite the need of his presence, despite his desire to attend, he was absolutely unable to raise ten dollars wherewith to pay the railway fare from his home to the city of Charleston. And this is but one case of a long and distressing catalogue.

Mr. President, it is not simply the question of pecuniary ability, it is the question of sympathy, it is the question of feeling, that will always control the intimacies of men. It is the pecular genius of our Government that men are left free to form their associations, religious, political, and social, and such will ever be the case, and all attempts by force of law to change it will prove fruitless and unavailing.

A word more, sir, in regard to our military men. It is my pleasure and good fortune to number among my friends and personal acquaintances many gentlemen of the United States Army. I have frequently heard from them expressions in regard to the unpleasant nature of the duties they have been called upon to perform since the end of the war in the Southern States. They have been placed in an attitude of coercion and of apparent unfriendliness to the people in order to execute congressional legislation. They have not been allowed to execute those laws according to their own theory of wisdom and propriety, or in accordance with their own sympathy; but they have been placed there as a kind of police, at the beck and call of partisan appointees. They have not been allowed to treat the people of the South as they desired to do, but they have been compelled to perform a vast amount of most objectionable work at the call of a low, base set of wretches, thrown to the surface of society in the throes of revolution and excitement.

What have you seen in Louisiana? The Army of the United States, with a soldier somewhat distinguished at its head, compelled to obey the command of such a class of political scoundrels and adventurers as those into whose hands political power has been placed against law and the popular will in that unhappy State. How can men who are subordinated to such creatures as Pinchback, Kellogg, Packard, and the like, expect that they are to be received as guests and friends by the gentlemen over whom they dominate, and by the people of whose civil rights they are made the instruments of destruction? It is absurd to expect it, and no sensible man does expect it.

Depend upon it, sir, the human heart is the best teacher in regard to this matter. Whenever the southern people or the people of the North shall feel that an Army officer or a civilian, whether the representative of the Government or a private citizen seeking either health or recreation, comes among them as a friend and with the heart of a friend, he will be received as such; but when he comes among them otherwise he will not be received as such, and all the laws you may pass from now until doomsday will never be worth one farthing for the purpose of preventing it.

But, as I said, in regard to this individual case, having no personal knowledge of Major Merrill, having never seen him, and all that I can learn of him in this transaction not making me desirous of making his acquaintance, all I can say is that his course in this matter may in the eyes of the Senator from Pennsylvania be perfectly honorable and proper; but I cannot believe it will be so considered by his brother officers or by the American people whose paid servant he was and still is. It is the first time in the history of our country, to my knowledge, that any officer of the United States Army has pursued for his private gain the trade of lobbying in a State Legislature to obtain pecuniary rewards for the execution of the duties for which he was intrusted with large powers and high discretion, and especially assigned to execute, and paid exorbitantly, ten times the amount of his official salary. And all this for the performance of functions which are justly regarded as ignominious.

The name of informer is odious to the American people. The name of detective is not respected by the American people. If such things are sometimes necessary, they are unhappily necessary; but they are not to be performed for the sake of pecuniary gain by officers of the United States Army, especially when, as we all know, martial law had been proclaimed in that State. Martial law is no law, but simply the will of the commander-in-chief. All other law fades away before his glance; and part of the time that this officer was in Carolina, in a large part of that State he was the military commandant, and his will was the supreme law, for the President of the United States had suspended the writ of habeas corpus. What was the power of such a man over that country? What was his influence over the body of ignorant and degraded people collected under the name of a Legislature in that State to plunder those who had no power to control their selection? It was omnipotent. How could they resist his demands? They could not; and therefore, as a matter of course, when his influence was thrown in the scale, his demands took the shape of law, and this large sum of money, $35,000, was taken out of that treasury for the purpose of paying these rewards in the criminal cases. The report of the committee of distribution I caused to be read two or three days ago.

Now, Mr. President, to understand the state of affairs in South Carolina, you cannot take the condition of other States in the more favored section of this Union—in the North, where such things would be impossible. You cannot speak of the will of the people, acting through the Legislature, deliberately rewarding a man for high public service; but you must consider that this is a State in chains, impoverished, and held by the throat by a band of ruffians, who are plundering her at every moment of her life.

An informant who ought to speak with authority on this subject—and when I say "authority," I mean the authority of an intelligent eye-witness, and an eye-witness with none of those prejudices which might be supposed to cloud his vision in respect of the rights of northern men in the Southern States—I speak of Mr. James S. Pike, who was late United States minister at the Hague, and who, having spent some time in South Carolina, has given the result of his inspection of things there to the public in the shape of a book called "The Prostrate State," from which I will read. He says in chapter 12:

The Federal Government could do much, if it would take the necessary pains, towards correcting some of the worst practices of this corrupt travesty of a government. * * * * * * *

The only authority to which these miscreants pay the least deference is the Federal Government; for its power and its countenance are requisite to the success of many of their own operations. It makes large appropriations for new public edifices in the State, as is attested by those which are now going up in Charleston and Columbia. It appoints to office the large body of revenue officers, both internal and external, the numerous postmasters, the Federal judges, attorneys, and special agents, and it keeps bodies of Federal troops in the State, which are everywhere welcome for the money they disburse. Through these and kindred influences the Federal Government holds vast sway over the State. That for some reason it has not exercised its influence to any appreciable extent in the interest of good government is evident. It might do much toward repressing many corrupt practices and raising the moral tone of the State government. It has not done this, and yet it would seem to be its interest to do it. Why should the republican party of the country, composed so largely as it is of its best and most conscientious citizens, be compelled to endure the foul stain inflicted by the robberies and outrages of caitiffs, who deserve the State prison? Some of the leaders of affairs are men who have merely adopted republicanism as a cloak for their villainies. South Carolina to-day rejoices in a republican Representative in Congress, who once made a formal proposition in the State Legislature to reduce all the free blacks to slavery, and it has a republican governor who tore down the American flag from Fort Sumter, and, treading it under foot, hoisted the Confederate ensign in its place. Dancing at negro balls and issuing pay certificates as speaker are said to have been the means whereby he has condoned his offenses. One turns with inexpressible loathing and disgust from such wretched demagogues. They cover republicanism with reproach, and, what is worse, they depress and extinguish the hopes of philanthropic men who wish to see the capacity and better qualities of the black man fairly tested in the bold experiment of his sudden emancipation and enfranchisement.

Why, Mr. President, the Senate and the country will be partially aware of the shocking waste and misrule of the finances of that State, of which this payment of $35,000 is but a small illustration, when I state upon the authority of a public address made by Colonel Richard Lathers, in Charleston, on the 16th of December, delivered before the New England Society of Charleston, that the approved printing bills alone of the last South Carolina Legislature for a single year exceeded the average yearly total taxation of the State before the war for a period of ten years. And all this printing, for the use of a Legislature a majority of whose members cannot read the documents that they cause to be printed. This monstrous fact shows the country the character of legislation through whose action this officer of the United States Army was enabled to obtain an excessive sum of money, to the great loss of a plundered people, and the injury of the reputation of the honorable branch of public service to which he belongs.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator let me ask him a question there?

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection.

Mr. WEST. He speaks of individuals who form a portion of that Legislature not being able to read. Will he tell us why they were unable to read? They had not been allowed to learn to read.

Mr. BAYARD. That question may seem to suit the gentleman at this time. There have been periods in his own life when probably he could have given himself the answer he now seeks, because he lived in a country and in a community and under a law in sympathy with those who prevented them from learning. He is one of those who are responsible for the very thing he now stands up in the Senate and asks me to account for, as if it would affect what I have to say. It is not a question in the present connection as to what prevented these men from learning to read or write. It is whether, being unlearned and grossly ignorant, they are fit to be rulers of a people. It is not an inquiry into cause, but a question of inquiry into the fact. The fact is true that the mere printing bills for a Legislature in a single year exceed the entire expense of the government of that State for any year for a period of ten years before the war. The printing bills before the war amounted to $5,000 a year, and in this last year amounted to $331,945, leaving $118,000 still unpaid.

Mr. President, as a reason why this resolution not only should pass, but why it should command the attention of every man in the Senate and in the country, that we may do our best as far as the influence of the Federal Government can go to prevent a repetition of these acts of wrong, I read from this book of Mr. Pike:

> The war, the events of the war, the men of the war, hang like a thick, impenetrable curtain before the eyes of the present generation of northern people, hiding from view a past history, and existing facts, and a present situation, all of which are profoundly essential to a proper understanding of the problem with which the statesmanship of the country has now to deal. There is in the South to-day an enormous mass of inherited worth, virtue, and capacity, and wisdom, and every solid element of citizenship, that has an indefeasible right to demand recognition, and justice, and fraternal consideration. The commonest sentiments of humanity require it. The ties of a common lineage and a common Government demand it.
> * * * * * * *
> Every generous impulse prompts it. The dictates of a wise statesmanship imperiously exact it. Nothing stands in the way of such recognition but a blind, selfish, partisan hostility, that is as undying in its revenges as it is merciless in its judgments.

Mr. President, I believe these words are true, and I consider that it is the duty of every man, democrat or republican, administration or opposition, to join in the attempt to enforce common honesty where we can and upon our own officials, and by the example of our treatment of them to teach those communities whom we can affect and control that it is their duty and their obligation to act in like manner. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the introduction on the day before yesterday of the name of an officer of the United States Army impelled me at once, and without having time for reflection, to answer for a few moments the statements made by the Senator from Delaware. I would have been content to let this resolution pass and this question rest where the discussion that morning placed it, but the statements now made by the Senator from Delaware require some notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will be allowed to conclude his remarks by common consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that after the Senator from Pennsylvania is through, as he is proceeding now, I will insist upon going on with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the Senator from Pennsylvania proceeding with his remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. Prior to this discussion, Mr. President, the resolution offered by the Senator from Delaware had not attracted my attention. It was, as I have said, the introduction of the name of this Army officer that induced me to speak upon the resolution. But since then I have looked at the resolution, and remembering that the Senator from Delaware in his remarks characterized the opposition which has been made to it as coming from those who represented the Administration, and remembering that this morning he has complained that there has been a disregard of the request made in his resolution, I ask attention now to the date when it was offered. It was offered on the 1st day of March, 1873, when that Congress had just three days of official life to live. It is true we have convened again; and if this had been a continuing request in a new Congress, the Senator might perhaps complain that his resolution has not yet been answered. It is evident there was not time to answer it during that Congress, for I proceed to show now the extraordinary character of the information that is called for in this resolution. I adverted to it very briefly in my remarks on Wednesday morning.

Of course there are upon the files of the War Department, and in all the Executive Departments, such papers and information as may naturally be called for as affecting the officers in those Departments. If we wished to get information with reference to an officer of the Army, we would go to the War Department for it; of the Navy, we would go to the Navy Department for it. But now what I wish to advert to is the fact that the President is here asked to communicate information affecting an officer of the Army, which, if it be within the knowledge of any official personage, can be within the knowledge only of the officers of the government of South Carolina. If rewards were paid to Major Merrill, nothing in the War Department will show it. The receipts upon file in the office of the treasurer of South Carolina would perhaps show it. If Major Merrill was admitted to the bar in a State court in South Carolina, or in a United States court sitting in South Carolina, the records of the court would show it. If he has practiced law for his private benefit—I put the inquiry to the Senator from Delaware—where would the President find means of informing himself of that fact?

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield. I put the inquiry, and am willing to hear an answer now.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am amazed to hear it doubted that any fact connected with an officer's conduct while stationed on duty at any particular place cannot be learned by the War Department, if they desire to do so; and I am amazed to hear it doubted that any fact connected with that officer's conduct is not within the power of the Secretary of War to inquire into. He could obtain this information and return it to the Senate in the course of three days had he been so disposed. I have known cases where an inquiry was set on foot, where information was sent for and obtained, and I myself had it communicated to me, in regard to the conduct of officers in the United States service in respect of private matters which was supposed to involve some indecorum. Therefore it is perfectly plain to me that there is nothing in this resolution that the War Department could not practically have answered had it been disposed to do so.

Mr. SCOTT. I certainly am satisfied with the answer of the Senator from Delaware, if he is; for I have failed to perceive in it any information as to where the President could ascertain that Major Merrill had received fees from private clients. But I proceed as to this information.

The Senator from Delaware sent to the Chair and had read a statement purporting to be official from the records of South Carolina, showing that if this officer had been guilty of any offense for which he deserves to be condemned by the Rules and Regulations of the Army, any offense unworthy of a soldier or a gentleman, that information in an official form is not only accessible, but has been furnished to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. It is furnished to the Administration as much as it is to me. I read from a public newspaper, showing that I had good grounds to offer this resolution.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Delaware read from a public newspaper what purported to be an official document, a report made by commissioners to distribute certain rewards to the governor of South Carolina; and there is the gist of this alleged offense, that an officer of the Army has received a reward from the Legislature of South Carolina.

Now, sir, I come to a gratifying feature of this case. The Senator from Delaware was prompted in March last, he says, to make an effort to relieve the people of South Carolina from the great oppression of having this money paid to an officer of the United States Army. The citizens of South Carolina, who see proper to take offense at the conduct of Major Merrill, I have no doubt, have prompted the Senator from Delaware to introduce his resolution and make remarks which reflect upon the character of that officer. How glad I am to find that those citizens of South Carolina are becoming solicitous for the honor of the officers of the United States Army.

I spent some days in official duties in the capital of that State, where I was pointed to the blackened ruins of what were called the Vandal hands of the officers of the Union Army; and I remember (and it is a public fact in the history of the last two years which many others will remember) that the illustrious soldier now at the head of that Army has been held up by the citizens of that State to the public gaze of the United States as the author of, or responsible for, that grievous offense.

And they are solicitous for the honor of the United States Army; so much so that they come here to vindicate the honor of the Army, even at the expense of the honor of their own Legislature! What a wonderful revulsion in the State pride of South Carolina when her chivalric sons can come before the Senate of the United States and seek, by defaming the Legislature of their own State which they have so fondly cherished in times past, to vindicate the sullied honor of the United States Army!

Mr. President, if they had wished to vindicate the honor of the Army, no men knew better than the men of intelligence who gave this information to the Senator from Delaware that, promptly and speedily, this officer could have been cashiered, and his epaulets torn from his shoulders by a court-martial, and he dismissed in disgrace, if he had been guilty of conduct unworthy of a soldier or a gentleman. The War Department was open to them. They had their official records which showed the payment of this money. Why not prefer their charges, and have this officer brought before a court-martial for the purpose of meeting them, instead of calling through the Senate upon the President for information which their own State records furnish them?

I have no knowledge of this legislation. I know not how it was prompted, or that it was, further than the information received a few moments since from one of the Senators from South Carolina, who, I have no doubt, on this subject will speak, and properly, for his State. That is not my purpose. But on this point I may simply say that I am informed that these rewards were offered by the executive of that State for the apprehension and conviction of Ku Klux criminals, without any intervention of the Legislature in the first instance at all, and that after the apprehension and conviction of a number of these criminals the Legislature did pass a law appropriating money for the payment of them.

Mr. PATTERSON. I beg leave, with the consent of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to say that the rewards were offered by the governor before the law was passed by Congress, and a year before Colonel Merrill came into the State.

Mr. SCOTT. That is a very important statement. The rewards were offered one year before the act for the conviction of these criminals was passed, and before Major Merrill went into the State.

Now, sir, following up the idea that this is out of solicitude for the Army of the United States and to vindicate its honor, let me call attention to the fact that this is not the first time that Major Merrill's name has been introduced in connection with this subject. I have already referred to the state of feeling which existed in the town in which he was located, not, as the Senator from Delaware would seem to intimate, by way of complaint that the citizens of that town saw fit to choose other social companions than Major Merrill out of such motives as he has adverted to; but I refer to it simply to show that Major Merrill was performing an incongenial and a disagreeable duty, that he did perform it faithfully, and that in consequence of his faithful performance of that duty the men who wished that duty not to be performed were pursuing him with relentless rancor. I read from the report of the Committee on the Condition of the Insurrectionary States, page 577, which is the minority report:

Major Merrill's principal misson at Yorkville seemed to be, from his own statement, to get up a list of the whippings administered to the blacks by the Ku-Klux, including a period of time of nearly a year prior to his arrival at Yorkville. He did not seem to take any interest in what the carpet-baggers and negroes were doing in the mean time. In being sent there to keep the peace, he thought he was fully performing his duty by noting the acts and doings of one side only. He says he was acting under instructions from General Terry, and it is presumable that General Terry was acting under orders from the War Department at Washington. No good man will object to their operations against the Ku-Klux.

Always a disclaimer put in; but somehow or other even the Senator from Delaware, in speaking of these same men the other morning, could not help characterizing them as "the miserable men who were now languishing in the penitentiary at Albany."

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will permit me to say that it was because I believed they were there unjustly, never having had a fair trial. That is why. I do not condemn men unheard.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will permit me, I will show him that at least fifty of them went there without a trial, and upon their own plea of guilty.

Mr. BAYARD. If it would not be at all a breach of our private conversation——

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly; go on.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I will say that I was glad to find, and not at all surprised to find, that the Senator from Pennsylvania had been active in procuring the pardons of many of those men who had been sent to the penitentiary, because he believed, I suppose, that they were there unjustly; indeed I think I might use his own language. He thought they had been there because they were duped. I mentioned at the same time to him that a man from New York whose earnestness and sincerity were never doubted by friend or foe, Gerrit Smith, had gone to the Albany penitentiary, had there instituted a long examination in respect to this class of cases, and had certified to the President and the Department of Justice that in many, if not most of these cases, he believed these men had been unjustly convicted. There stands his report—the report of a man all of whose prejudices were aroused against this class of offenses; and this very man, on examination has made this return; and so I believe, if the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, who I only wish could have been the judge upon the bench to try these cases, and then if he had heard the testimony, and if he had tried the cases and he had passed sentence upon these parties, I never should have spoken or suggested a word about injustice; for I do not think he is capable of committing it.

Mr. SCOTT. I am thankful to the gentleman, both for his reference to my action in having these pardons granted and for the compliment he has just paid to what he thinks would be my judicial impartiality. But as he has referred, by my consent, to that conversation in which I spoke of my participation in having the pardons of these men granted, I take pleasure in saying that although I sought to do my duty in ferreting out this conspiracy and holding it up to the execration of the civilized world, I do know that among those convicted a majority of them were the mere dupes of the men of brains and influence who made them the instruments of their hellish designs; and I did say to the Senator from Delaware that wherever I found a man in prison who I was satisfied was but the dupe of craftier and abler men, I had gone to the Executive and I had asked his pardon. I did not question the correctness of the convictions, either of the miserable followers or the few active leaders who have been punished; but I do regret to-day that all the men who are in prison yet are not the prominent leaders, the authors, the contrivers of this infamous organization, but its more humble and less guilty instruments.

But, sir, this is an interruption of a quotation, and quite a long interruption; I will continue it:

No good man will object to their operations against the Ku-Klux; but when this whole investigation, whether it was so intended or not, will be used for party purposes against the white people of South Carolina, as responsible for the actions of the Ku-Klux against the negroes, it would seem to be proper that the acts of both sides should be known. This idea never seemed to have entered the impartial mind of Major Merrill, or his superiors——

They do not confine it to Major Merrill; General Terry and the War Department are brought in.

This idea never seemed to have entered the impartial mind of Major Merrill, or his superiors, whether a general commanding a department, or the Government.

They then proceed to quote Major Merrill's testimony. Now, sir, did I not feel that I would be taking up unnecessarily the time of the Senate in this prolonging of the morning hour, I should like to read from the report made by Major Merrill, which resulted in the conviction of these men in South Carolina. A Senator near me says, "Read it." Before proceeding to do that, however, I trust I shall be pardoned for referring to another statement of the Senator from Delaware. In stating that I did not know what motives prompted the Legislature of South Carolina to offer these rewards at the time, I referred to the fact that these men had friends in that State to such an extent as to have contributions levied for the purpose of carrying on their defense; and when the Senator from Delaware replied to that statement of mine, he spoke of my having made a charge of this character against the people of South Carolina for the purpose of showing that they were in sympathy with this organization; that I had made it upon my own responsibility, and that I ought not to have made it. Now, to show that I did not make it on my own responsibility, I quote the appeal with the names that were to it:

[Circular.]

Eminent counsel from the North have been employed to defend the men prosecuted under the Ku-Klux acts of Congress. This has been undertaken in order that ample justice may be done, and to the end that the constitutional questions involved may be considered. This is deemed a public duty. In order to carry out this purpose, it is necessary to raise the sum of $15,000. Your county has been assessed $2,000, which you will please raise and transmit to Columbia to the committee in charge.

WADE HAMPTON,
M. C. BUTLER,
J. B. PALMER,
J. P. THOMAS,
S. L. LEAPHART,
W. B. STANLEY,
JOHN MCKENZIE,
Committee.

Colonel C. JONES, Rock Hill, South Carolina.

MY DEAR SIR: Mr. Stanbery, Reverdy Johnson, and Judge Barrett, of New York, have consented to come, and we shall need $15,000. Do raise what you can.

Yours, truly,

WADE HAMPTON.

Following that is an indorsement of this call by the paper printed in the town in which Major Merrill was located, the Yorkville Enquirer. He had reported to General Terry, his superior officer, the state of things existing in that county, and a grand jury sitting at the court in Columbia, South Carolina, after this report made this statement in a presentment to the court. After presenting the condition of things existing in the upper counties of South Carolina, they say:

That for this condition of things, for all these violations of law and order, and the sacred rights of citizens, many of the leading men of those counties were responsible. It was proven that large numbers of the most prominent citizens were members of the order. Many of this class attended meetings of the Grand Klan. At a meeting of the Grand Klan, held in Spartanburgh County, at which there were representatives from the various dens of Spartanburgh, York, Union, and Chester Counties, in this State, besides a number from North Carolina, a resolution was adopted that no raids should be undertaken, or any one whipped or injured by members of the Klan, without orders from the Grand Klan. The penalty for violating this resolution was one hundred lashes on the bare back for the first offense, and for the second, death. This testimony establishes the nature of the discipline enforced in the order, and also the fact that many of the men who were openly and publicly speaking against the Klan, and pretending to deplore the work of this murderous conspiracy, were influential members of the order, and directing its operations even in detail.

* * * * * * *

We would say further, that unless the strong arm of the Government is interposed to punish these crimes committed upon this class of citizens, there is every reason to believe that an organized and determined attempt at retaliation will be made, which can only result in a state of anarchy and bloodshed too horrible to contemplate.

At that term of that court—and here comes in the statement of the number who pleaded guilty to which I referred the Senator a few moments since—I quote:

True bills were found against 785 defendants, there being about 500 defendants in all, and some named in several bills. Of these 5 were convicted on trial, 53 pleaded guilty, and the others could not be tried, and were held over.

Now, whatever may be said about the character of some of the witnesses who were examined on these trials—and I doubt not there were men who might be prompted by mere mercenary motives if they supposed that a reward could be obtained, but, as I am informed by the Senator from South Carolina, that could not have operated on the witnesses at that time, for there was no assurance of any reward given—whatever may have been the character of some of them, the fact that fifty-three of those men pleaded guilty to the indictments that were found against them ought to silence forever the clamor against the character of the court before which these men were tried.

Why, sir, did I wish to pursue this subject, I would take up the report of Major Merrill with reference to the proceedings in the county in which he was stationed—in York—to show that it could not be otherwise than that the man who went there and did his duty would incur the eternal hatred of all that class of society who at that time were sympathizing with these operations—and it is not to be denied that there were very many of them, and I speak it from sad experience; I would it had been otherwise. There was a state of things existing in that society which no man could appreciate unless he was there and felt it. There was an atmosphere about it that cannot be described; and the terror under which men lived in that community was well illustrated by a man who bears the name of a signer of the Declaration of Independence when he said, eminent lawyer as he was, that although he condemned the organization and believed it existed, his own personal safety required him to keep from uttering that condemnation.

Well, sir, with that state of society existing, was it wonderful that the governor of South Carolina should be induced, in the discharge of his duty, to offer rewards for securing these men? Is it wonderful now even that the Senator from Delaware should complain that there was perjury in some of these trials? Why, sir, if there may have been witnesses perjured upon those trials, I think subsequent history will show that a more enormous mountain of perjury never was piled up than was committed by witnesses who were brought before the committee to testify about this organization. Perjury was one of the provided means of defense for its members.

Let me illustrate by just one case. In the very town in which Major Merrill lived and where he discharged his duty, we brought before us a physician; and as the case subsequently obtained notoriety, I will give his name. It was Dr. James R. Bratton. He was a man of education, a leader in society, as all the prominent physicians are in the county towns of South Carolina; a man of intelligence and culture; a man who stood high in the community. We heard Dr. Bratton's name in all quarters as a respectable man. He came before that committee. I examined him, as faithfully as I ever examined a witness in court, for a solid hour, and he stood there denying his knowledge of the Ku-Klux organization, not simply his participation in it as an individual, not simply his knowledge of crimes that were called to his attention by name, but his knowledge of the existence of the organization. When the President exercised the power vested in him of suspending the writ of habeas corpus, Dr. Bratton took his flight to Canada. Many Senators may remember seeing the account of what occurred in one of the towns in Canada when the effort was made to capture and bring him back.

Now, sir, on the trial in South Carolina of another man for murdering a man by the name of Jim Williams, witnesses who had no motive to testify against Dr. Bratton—he was not on trial; he was out of the country—testified that he was the leader of a Ku-Klux band which met in the town of Yorkville in the hours of the night; that he himself procured the rope, hung it on his own saddle-bow, and led the gang out to Jim Williams's residence, put that rope around his neck, and hanged him.

But, sir, lest even my statement may need corroboration with the Senator from Delaware, let me read for one moment what a distinguished gentleman said about that case.

I quote from the address of Mr. Stanbery, a gentleman who before that time occupied the position of Attorney-General of the United States, upon the trial of these men in Columbia, South Carolina. Lest my denunciation of this proceeding should be attributed to feeling, let me read his remarks. Mr. Stanbery says:

> How, in God's name, gentlemen, can you make him—

That is, the man who was on trial—

> responsible for the horrid outrage that followed? Why, gentlemen, did not the men that were detailed to go down there and seize the man suppose they were going for his arms? They were absent about an hour, or less than an hour, and when they returned they were silent; the question was, "Have you got the arms?" No response whatever, but some showed guns. In a little while Dr. Bratton—

Mark it, the man I referred to, although he was not on trial—> in answer to a question put to him by some man where Williams was, said, "He is now in hell." Gentlemen, I do not stand here to justify Dr. Bratton, but to defend this young man; let Dr. Bratton answer for himself, and do not hold this young man guilty on account of his misdeeds. I do not justify that horrid outrage that was committed there that night. It makes my blood run cold to listen to the relation of it; after they had got his guns, to take him out from his family, and without a moment's time to make his peace with God, to launch him into the other world, and upon their return to speak of it in the impious manner which has been detailed! Gentlemen, the right man is not here. You have the proof, but not the offender.

Here is no imaginary case. Here are no witnesses seeking to convict the man on trial for the purpose of procuring a reward; but here is incidental testimony as to the guilt of this leader in society, who had stood up for an hour perjuring himself as to the existence of that organization and his connection with it.

When that kind of perjury could be rampant in South Carolina was it much wonder that the Legislature felt authorized in offering rewards for the conviction of men shielded by the panoply of such a combination and such perjury? I shall leave that subject to the Senators from South Carolina; but I am showing what Major Merrill had to deal with. His residence was right across the street from that of Dr. Bratton; they could see each other every day. It was not the poverty of Dr. Bratton; it was not the pride which looks back upon departed affluence, and is unwilling to bring in the guest to look upon the rags of the present poverty. It was just what the Senator from Delaware has characterized as that feeling which even Lord Dundreary could find out, that birds of a feather flock together; and, sir, the man who was proud of commanding under the United States flag at Yorkville was not the man to whom the birds of the other feather flocked. Following the suggestion, I might add that which feather a man wore was just one of the things which in that latitude "any fellow could find out."

That was the secret of the social ostracism. That was the secret which led this man, Major Merrill, to discharge his duty there; he honored his country's flag; they did not. And it is for that fidelity, is it, that these men are now seeking to vindicate the honor of the United States Army. In the name of justice and patriotism, Mr. President, if the President has this information, let us have it; if he has to send to South Carolina to get it, let him send for it and send it to us. As I said before, I have confidence in the honor and integrity of this officer. That is all I stand here for—to vindicate the honor of the United States Army, and I am glad I have such an able and talented coadjutor as my friend, the Senator from Delaware. We have worked together for a common purpose, to do justice. We have looked at the question out of which this proceeding arises in a different light. I know his goodness of nature; I know the tenderness of his heart; I know that I have seen him as indignant when tales of outrage and wrong were narrated before that committee as any member of the Administration party was, and I know he is honest and sincere in condemnation of these individual wrongs; but somehow or other, whenever the question comes up affecting the aggregate body of these offenders, or so that the Administration can be made in any way responsible for any wrong in the Southern States, the goodness of his heart over individual cases seems to get underneath the strong desire which he has to throw this great wrong into the shade by speaking of others not connected with it, and to put the Administration in the wrong.

Here is a report signed by the Senator in which Major Merrill is arraigned. Here are reports in South Carolina by which they say he is compromised. Why, then, could not his accusers pursue the ordinary course, and have him court-martialed and tried, if he is guilty? Why is it that the Senator from Delaware must come into the Senate and offer a resolution asking for information which could be more appropriately obtained in South Carolina? Is it true that we still differ politically about this question, notwithstanding morally we agree in execrating the horrible crimes that were committed by this Klan, in the suppression of which, as I have heretofore said, Major Merrill bore a more conspicuous part than any other man in the service of the Government?

I did not say, and I wish here to correct the statement of the Senator from Delaware—I would not be put in the position of saying that if Major Merrill had done wrong in South Carolina he should be compensated for doing the wrong; or that, if he had suffered social ostracism, rewards should be paid to him as a solatium for his wounded feelings. No, sir; but recalling the instances that have occurred in our own Government where officers of the United States Army have accepted rewards offered by public proclamation for capturing those who were considered enemies to the Government, and remembering as I do that in all my intercourse with the officers of the Army with whom I have come in contact I have never heard the fair fame of Major Merrill questioned, I feel satisfied that when this information comes in, or when a court-martial shall be ordered, he will be found to have sustained his character as a soldier and a gentleman. I shall very much regret and be very much disappointed if it be otherwise; but if it be otherwise, he will find no apologist in me.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I can echo very heartily the wish of the Senator from Pennsylvania. If this officer shall, upon examination, be found free from blame, be found clean-handed, be found to have been mindful of the high repute of an officer of the United States Army, I can only say, most honestly, I shall be glad of it, and will rise here to say so. I have made no imputation upon him of my personal knowledge. I have stated facts from the public press, and I have waited for information from authentic sources before my final judgment upon his acts should be passed. I have been dealing with a supposititious case with regard to which information was required, and with regard to which I felt it my duty to ask for information and press for it, and press for it I always shall, until it is obtained.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me, the difference between my honorable friend and myself is this: he admits, with simple justice to me, that I have no sympathy with the wrongs which have been perpetrated in the South upon any class within their midst; he agrees that my indignation is as great toward a base, unmanly, or cruel act as his own; and I think that in so doing he has done me simple justice; but, sir, I wish that I could say for him that his sympathies had responded as quickly to the white inhabitants of the South when wrong was done them. It has been to me the strangest thing that Americans, Senators, men of character, could witness the oppression which they have; could listen to the details of the wrongs before their committees to which they did listen, and yet feel nothing in the way of sympathy for the white people of the South, who were so utterly downtrodden and oppressed.

Why, sir, grant that these secret orders did exist—and in regard to their existence there is very grave reason to doubt; if they did exist it was a thing of the past—were there no wrongs to cause them? Were there no wrongs done in attempting to suppress them? Sir, the pages of those thirteen volumes are filled, and the ears of the Senate could be occupied for three months in listening to the tales of wrong upon a downtrodden and oppressed people that would command, and that do command, in every quarter of the world where political prejudice does not override human feeling, sympathy from every right-minded person. And yet, at the same time, if there has been wrong committed against Major Merrill, I will join in denouncing it. But it seems impossible to get the Senator to find the least fault or to admit the least possibility of blame on the part of these agents of the United States Government or the people with whom they co-operated in the Southern States.

Now, Mr. President, there was a week last spring before Congress adjourned, and several weeks of a special session of the Senate, and nearly three months of the present session for the President to have taken notice of this resolution and the facts it referred to. If he had wanted to do so he could have done so. As I said in opening these remarks, and now I repeat, if there had been a will, there would have been a way, and that $21,400 would not to-day have been in the pockets of Major Merrill, but in the treasury of South Carolina.

The Senator finds fault with certain well-known highly honored citizens of the Southern States for having publicly called for pecuniary aid to defray the expense of defending the men who were indicted under the enforcement act. Whom did they employ? They sought men eminent in the North; and, sir, there is a world of meaning when the southern men have to come to the North to get a voice to be heard in their behalf. It was not that there were not able lawyers in the South; it was not that there were not men of eminence in the South; it was full of them; it is full of them; but they would speak to northern ears, and northern ears that were deaf to the appeal of the southern people for justice; and so they came to the North, and they selected Reverdy Johnson and Henry Stanbery, each of whom had been Attorney-General of the United States, men of the highest grade of professional ability and standing. Is there to be reproach in that? Did they conduct this case in an unprofessional, unworthy, underhand way? Did they seek to defeat justice by the sly tricks of the lower grades of the profession? No, sir; they sought only to see whether the Constitution could not extend its shield over the southern man in the Federal courts of the South as well as in the Federal courts of the North. They went there to urge an honest plea; not to shelter crime, but to insist upon the protection of innocence. They lent their abilities to vindicate that which is your protection, sir, and mine, which is your heritage and mine, and of which the southern people have been deprived by the legislation of Congress for the past eight years. The guarantees of liberty intended to be secured by the Constitution of the United States—this was all that it was sought to intervene between the parties charged and their prosecutors in the Federal courts. They simply wished a test made of the constitutionality of the enforcement acts. Does not the Senator know that when one of that class of cases came before the Supreme Court of the United States the writ was refused only by a tie vote of the court, and that as yet the question remains undecided whether Congress have the right to enter a State and try a man for crimes which are cognizable by the State laws, and which they are fully disposed and amply able to punish?

But, Mr. President, has it come to be a crime, are men to be held up in the Senate of the United States as being guilty of a crime, when they seek the courts of law to vindicate their rights? This enforcement act was passed under the pretense of enforcing law, of preventing lawlessness, and this Chamber resounded with the voice of my friend from Pennsylvania, and his colleagues on the other side, in favor of the enactment of the law to prevent lawlessness. They said the southern men had appealed to lawlessness, to violence, instead of appealing to law; and, lo, when the law is passed and they appeal to the law, the Senator rises in his place in the Senate and, by inference at least, denounces the men who raised the money to enable their poorer countrymen to test the constitutionality of the act; for such is the position to which he comes.

Mr. SCOTT. I trust the Senator from Delaware will not permit himself to say that I have denounced them for raising the money for that purpose, in view of what I stated the day before yesterday, that I rejoiced that they had a fair trial; that they were entitled to it; and that that was introduced by way of contrast simply, not by way of denunciation.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I have misunderstood the object of the Senator in parading for the third or fourth time the names of these gentlemen who signed the public call for subscription. I heard them cruelly, unjustly, shamefully denounced in this very Chamber for having signed that paper. Sir, they simply did what they had a right to do; and when they sought to protect the poor and the helpless against the combined power of the Government, and see that a fair trial according to law was granted to them, they did what was honorable and what every right-minded man must respect them for. It is one of the boasts of our system that the meanest criminal shall not be punished until he has been heard and fairly tried; and that is all those gentlemen asked, and all that they sought for, on behalf of their fellow-citizens.

We are told that there was a plea of guilty by some fifty-three of the men indicted, which had been preceded by five cases of conviction, and that that plea of guilty by fifty-three of these ignorant men—the Senator will admit that they were ignorant——

Mr. SCOTT. Not all of them.

Mr. BAYARD. The most of them could hardly write their names. I produced in the Senate the stenographic report of those trials before Judge Bond in South Carolina, in which when these men were called up and questioned by him at the time, they pleaded guilty. They stated their ages, their occupations, and the amount of literary culture they possessed.

Mr. SCOTT. One of those fifty-three was a justice of the peace in South Carolina.

Mr. BAYARD. And in South Carolina, I believe, the majority of the justices of the peace cannot either read or write.

Mr. SCOTT. More than that, he was a distinguished elder in the Presbyterian Church.

Mr. BAYARD. He must have been a worse man than I supposed, to accumulate all these offenses upon his head. [Laughter.]

But, sir, here were fifty-three pleas of guilty; and from that we are told arises an unanswerable, overwhelming argument that these men knew of their guilt. Why, sir, what is the fact? They were told that they had better confess, and why? To save themselves from more extreme punishment. They had seen five cases tried; they knew what such a trial amounted to; they had seen the kind of juries before whom they must stand; they had witnessed the tone and temper of the judge before whom they were to be arraigned; they had seen the kind of testimony upon which men were to be deprived even of life itself, and incarcerated for long years in a distant prison. No wonder, with these facts before them, that they yielded to the suggestion of Major Merrill and his coadjutors and saved their prosecutors the trouble of trying them; because they were foredoomed. They pleaded in order to escape from more severe punishments; and I have myself read before the Senate from the record of the trial to show the fact.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the Senator know who were the presiding judges of that court?

Mr. BAYARD. Judge Bond was the presiding judge.

Mr. PATTERSON. And Judge Bryan also.

Mr. BAYARD. He was not the presiding judge. As to the cases I speak of, I read from the official report of the trial, of the pleas of guilty, of the remarks of the judge, of the character of the testimony produced; and in all that I have spoken by the card. I have the record, and can produce it to the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON. The court was presided over by Judge Bond and Judge Bryan, both of them southern men, one a native of Maryland, and the other a native of South Carolina.

Mr. BAYARD. When I am asked by a Senator, who I suppose understands the meaning of words used in courts of law, who presides at a trial, I generally mention the name of the presiding judge; and when I mention the name of the circuit judge of the United States, Mr. Bond, I mention the name of the judge who presided at those trials, and who controlled the admission of testimony.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am not a lawyer; but I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware this question: Is it not the fact that when a court is sitting with two judges, as, for instance, Judge Bond and Judge Bryan, they have equal jurisdiction; that one cannot act without the other; that both must act together; that one does not preside over the other when they are sitting in court?

Mr. BAYARD. No, sir. When Judge Bond and Judge Bryan sit together, Judge Bond may advise with Judge Bryan, but Judge Bond conducts the trial of the case. If they choose to give a certificate of difference of opinion, any point so certified may go up; but in all questions controlling the trial of the case the circuit judge decides.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think the Senator is mistaken, and I will refer him to the case of Mr. McMaster. A motion was made to strike Mr. McMaster from the list of attorneys; and the court divided upon it, and the motion could not be carried.

Mr. BAYARD. It matters very little whether this case was tried before two judges or one judge. I was only stating the facts in regard to the character of the tribunal; I am stating the composition of the juries before whom they were tried, and the character of the testimony introduced.

When my honorable friend from Pennsylvania spoke of admitting the possibility of a certain amount of perjury, he did not go further and refer to the horrible spectacle which I had referred to two days ago, that of a judge permitting the principal in a case of murder to come forward, with his reward in his pocket, stand in safety, and condemn another man to prison for an act that he himself admitted he perpetrated with his own red right hand.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not remember the case.

Mr. BAYARD. I read the report of the case and gave the name of the witness.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not recollect such a case now.

Mr. BAYARD. There is no question as to the fact. I once read the report to the Senate, and by reference to some remarks made by me a year or so ago it will appear.

Mr. SCOTT. In South Carolina?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir; in South Carolina, in Judge Bond's court.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator speaks of a witness who testified on these trials with the reward in his pocket. Does he refer to the rewards that were granted by the Legislature which he is inquiring about?

Mr. BAYARD. The Legislature paid the rewards for those convictions, I suppose, after the convictions were secured.

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well; but I understood the Senator from Delaware to state, a minute ago, to the Senate that the witness testified with the reward in his pocket. I ask the Senator now if he refers to the reward granted by the Legislature? That is the only reward I know of.

Mr. BAYARD. No; I could not mean the reward that had been paid by the Legislature subsequently, as a matter of course. He only had the promise of the money then. This murderer, in regard to whom the Senator now asks these questions, and whom he would acquit because he did not happen to have the money in his pocket at the moment he gave his vile testimony on the stand—this murderer stood up in safety and condemned a man of the State which the Senator represents to go to prison for a murder that he himself admitted he had committed, on a man tied to a tree and helpless. Has the Senator any defense to make of that?

Mr. PATTERSON. No, Mr. President, I have no defense to make for that witness; but I have this to say, that that witness, as far as the testimony goes, never received any reward, and if he was there, and by his testimony that man was sent to prison, it was right. Whether the Government was right in not sending him there is not for me to say; but we got one of them in prison.

Mr. BAYARD. Then he did it for love, and not for money.

Mr. PATTERSON. He got a streak of justice on him, perhaps.

Mr. BAYARD. I do know that according to the paper which I read the day before yesterday, purporting to be authentic, one class of the parties who had received these rewards were—

2. Parties who had been apprehended as conspirators, but had been used as witnesses for the prosecution of others.

Those men formed class 2 to receive their portion of the $35,000. Now, if the Senator from South Carolina thinks it makes a stronger case for his friends who received this money that they received it subsequently and did not have it actually in their pockets at the time they gave their testimony, he is welcome to the benefit of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator if he will not be willing to give way? I am informed that this matter cannot be disposed of now, because there are other Senators who wish to discuss it.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall be through what I have to say in a few minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. After the Senator is through, I shall ask the Senate to go on with the regular order.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have nothing to say in regard to the case of Dr. Bratton, and do not propose to try him at this time. I am not aware of the facts in his case. He may be worthy of all the condemnation that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania poured upon him. If the facts he stated are true, I will heartily join the Senator in his condemnation. But the question now is, why should Major Merrill be rewarded for his services in a single year, or in six months, to the tune of twenty-one thousand and some hundred dollars, when it seems now, according to the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that he succeeded in convicting only the wrong men; that all the while, right under his nose, across the street from him, resided the man who was the causa causans of all this trouble, the chief conspirator, and while Major Merrill was harrying that whole country and arresting other men by hundreds, he let this guilty man live right under his nose and did not arrest him? What a confession of incompetence is this, if nothing else! And yet that is the complaint here made.

Mr. SCOTT. I understood the Senator to put the question why Dr. Bratton was not arrested. Does he wish an answer?

Mr. BAYARD. I am only commenting upon it because the Senator says Bratton lived immediately across the street from Major Merrill's headquarters; Major Merrill had him under view all the time, did not like him, suspected him, was ostracized by him, and yet Bratton lived there and Major Merrill made hundreds of arrests of innocent men, but let Bratton alone.

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer the question. Up to the time that the proclamation was issued suspending the writ of habeas corpus there was nothing that would justify Major Merrill in arresting Dr. Bratton, and as soon as it got into the atmosphere that the writ of habeas corpus was going to be suspended he fled, so that he could not be arrested.

Mr. BAYARD. The right to arrest him under warrant existed before the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. The statement made by the Senator amounted to about this, as I understood it: to a confession that the whole of this harrying and dragonnade in South Carolina resulted in the conviction of the wrong men, and that the arrests and convictions that took place were of everybody but the real offenders and the parties who were guilty, and should have been punished.

It is true that I was not upon that sub-committee, and did not accompany my friend to South Carolina. I was busy on another committee elsewhere. I did serve in two of the other States, and South Carolina was also embraced within the district to which we were assigned. I passed through the State of South Carolina. I passed through those counties in which martial law had been proclaimed, and where Major Merrill's will was the sole law of the land. I remember well casting my eyes to the right and to the left from the time we entered the borders of those counties until we emerged from them, and it was a scene of desolation. No white man could be seen. He depopulated the country. The people fled from his rule. The plow was left in the furrow; the farms were abandoned. No man was safe. I remember meeting at a railway station two young men who sat down at the table with me, and I asked them in regard to the condition of the country. They told me it was because of the declaration of martial law; that no man, however aged, however respectable, was safe if the basest negro simply pointed his finger at him and asked for his military arrest. It was a reign of terror. It continued so. Men were arrested by hundreds, dragged from their families, incarcerated without writ, discharged sometimes without question and without any explanation, and without any charge being brought against them. Such was the condition of things there so long as there was no writ of habeas corpus, with Major Merrill in command, and no court open for their relief. That was martial law in America—the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus by the President in a time of profound peace, with the courts all open, where every judge was of his own party, every juror of his own party, every prosecuting officer of his own party, the whole machinery for the arrest, trial, and conviction of men confined to men of his own choice, because by the test oaths, which still prevail in the South, men are disabled from serving on a jury who ever performed the most natural dictates of humanity, the slightest act of friendship, of assistance, toward their own kindred and friends during the entire period of the war.

The Senator may sneer at the affected solicitude of the people of South Carolina for the honor of the Federal Army. It is for him to consider whether it is just to them and whether it is just to himself to do so. But the people of South Carolina did not cause this resolution. I make no especial profession of solicitude for the honor of the American Army. I only say that I have, in every way that a man can obtain it, a right to be so solicitous; it is my right to be solicitous; and if there were no other moving cause than my sympathy and friendship for a distressed and downtrodden people of my own race, a desire to save the poor remnant of their property from further robbery; if there were no other reason than my feeling of respect for the Army of the United States, that is sufficient to justify me, as it has prompted me, in offering this resolution. I hope therefore that it may be adopted, although I am quite willing the discussion should go on if Senators desire it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The morning hour having expired, this question necessarily goes over; but I wish to give notice to the Senate that I shall submit my views on this resolution before the vote is taken upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now insist on the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 911) to relinquish title of the United States in certain real estate near Columbia, Tennessee, to Rose Hill Cemetery.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourns to meet on Monday next.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

To the vacancy on the Committee on Enrolled Bills, occassioned by the resignation of Mr. Ames, the Chair appoints Senator PEASE. To the vacancy on the Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River, occasioned by the retirement of Mr. Crozier, the Chair appoints Senator HARVEY.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 911) to relinquish title of the United States in certain real estate near Columbia, Tennessee, to Rose Hill Cemetery, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NATIONAL BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes;" the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WRIGHT to the third section.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr President, the substitute which I offered to the pending bill was prepared hastily, and although it accomplishes the purpose I had in view, it is not as definite as I would like. I therefore ask leave to withdraw it and offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from North Carolina modifies his amendment, and it will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That $46,000,000 in notes for circulation, in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter, and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States, as provided in section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I should have preferred to submit the remarks which I now propose to make, upon the resolution reported from the Finance Committee, but the discussion upon the pending bill has become so general, has taken such a wide range, that I avail myself of this occasion to express some views which I entertain upon the general subject of our financial condition.

The subject is one of such vital importance to the people of the country, that any expression of opinion which can serve to elucidate it in any one or more of its bearings, or which can in any way direct thought and attention into a correct channel, will not have been uttered in vain.

Financial questions have been at all times questions of great difficulty and intricacy, so much so that in former times but few gentlemen who sat in this Chamber would attempt their discussion. They are none the less difficult now; indeed, they have become more complex by reason of the connection of the Government with the monetary system of the country. The subject, however, is here, and one with which we have to deal; and it is only by an interchange of views that we may hope to arrive at proper and just conclusions.

That there is very great financial embarrassment in many sections of the country is a proposition upon which all are agreed. There is also a very general concurrence of opinion upon the propriety and necessity of taking some action looking to the relief of the business of the country from its present embarrassment. The real difficulty seems to be in agreeing upon the appropriate remedy. Upon this point the views of Senators are widely divergent. Some who have preceded me in this debate think that relief can only be found in an expansion of the volume of the currency, while others are in favor of an early resumption of specie payments, and consequently oppose any inflation of the circulating medium. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] differing with both, opposes alike all contraction and all expansion, and prefers to wait until the policy pursued in the past shall work out, by gradual processes, the salvation of the country, by an assimilation in the values of coin and currency.

In reference to the cause of our financial troubles the views of Senators are as little in accord as upon the question of their remedy. One man attributes the cause to overtrading and speculation. Another supposes it can be found in a loss of that confidence so essential in all human transactions. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] a few days ago, regarded the recent panic or crisis as the result of a strange loss of confidence, which periodically seems to seize the public mind and unsettles all financial relations and calculations, and the effects of which cannot be stayed until it has run its course and disappears as suddenly and as causelessly as it commenced. Now, sir, I admit there may be some truth in both these views; but is there not some ulterior cause out of which sprang the overtrading and speculation, as well as the loss of confidence, assigned as the causes of our troubles? Is there not some primal cause which engendered and brought them forth, and to which may be attributed the source of our financial difficulties? Such, I am free to say, is my opinion. I believe the primary cause of the present financial embarrassment will be found in the monetary system fastened on the country by the Government, the evils of which have been aggravated by what I may term the financial policy pursued by the Government.

Before proceeding to discuss our present financial system, and to show that it is in part the source of our present difficulties, I desire very briefly to call attention to the monetary system that existed in the country prior to the inauguration of our present system.

At the commencement of the war the Government had no connection with the banking institutions of the country, and no connection with or responsibility for the currency which they issued.

Under the power conferred upon Congress in the Constitution, "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," &c., Congress had established mints for the coining of money, and had determined the value of the coins of the country, but had never undertaken to furnish the paper currency used in business transactions. This had been left to the people themselves under authority derived from charters granted by the States. And very early in the history of the country State banks came into existence, and supplied the circulating medium, in connection with the specie coined by the Government, required by the wants of business. The issues of State banks being at all times redeemable in coin, were, as a general rule, at par with specie, large amounts of which were kept constantly in the vaults of the banks for the purpose of redeeming their notes.

The specie thus kept on hand by the banks was paid out in the redemption of their paper issues whenever demanded, so that the paper issued by the banks was convertible into coin at the pleasure of the holder. This may not have been true of the wild-cat banks, as they were called, of the Southwest and Northwest; but, with few exceptions, it was true of the State banks in all the Eastern and Middle States, and also of some of the Southern and Western States. At that time no man had any difficulty in procuring at any bank any amount of gold in exchange for the notes of the bank, and, as a consequence, there was no depreciation in the value of the paper money in circulation. It was at all times convertible into coin at the bank of issue, and very little depreciation could occur so long as the bank was good. Banks sometimes failed from mismanagement or the dishonesty of officials, but not oftener under the State-bank system than under the national banking system.

At the commencement of the war our banks were in a most healthy and prosperous condition, furnishing all the currency demanded by the business of the country, and at the same time having an accumulated surplus which they furnished to the General Government when the Government had no means of its own. Who does not remember with what promptness and cheerfulness the banks in many sections of the country responded to the call for help by the Government in the commencement of the war, furnishing many millions of dollars to sustain it until such time as the Government could provide the means to carry on the war and sustain itself. I have heard the State-bank system decried in this debate, but I believe that under former regulations, which might be made still more perfect, it was a better financial system upon the whole than the present national banking system. At any rate, before the present financial system was brought in, we had a currency at par with specie, and which was less liable to fluctuation than our present currency, which to-day is not worth ninety cents on the dollar.

Under this old system the country was prosperous, the people comparatively free from debt, and while there may not have been such rapid strides in railroad and other improvements, resulting from combination of capital, and not attributable to any monetary system, still the progress in enterprise was neither slow nor uncertain, but kept pace with the wants of the people and the demands of business in every section of the country.

Such was the condition of our monetary affairs when the present financial system was incepted by the issue of greenbacks, and consummated by the establishment of the present national banking system and the destruction of the issue of State banks, by taxing them out of existence. And now, Mr. President, let me ask, is there a civilized country on earth whose financial or monetary system is worse than our own? It has completely banished gold and silver as a medium of exchange from the land, and converted them into articles of merchandise and traffic. For twelve years specie has been excluded from all business transactions among men in the ordinary affairs of life, and all business engagements have been made and conducted with reference to irredeemable, depreciated paper money.

Not only has specie been excluded from circulating as money, but the paper furnished by the Government has no fixed or certain value, but is shifting and fluctuating, and impresses the variableness of its character upon every species of property in the land. The loss arising from this fluctuation in values growing out of the character of the medium of exchange is immense, and baffles all computation. Every article of merchandise, every species of security, in short, everything in which men deal—whether it be that which enters into the consumption of life, or that in which men invest with the hope of profit—all are liable to depreciation because of the uncertainty in the value of the currency with which business is to be conducted.

Who can tell what will be the value of greenbacks or national-bank notes to-morrow, or next week, or next month, or next year; and this uncertainty in their value—I do not mean their intrinsic value, (for they have no intrinsic value,) but their marketable value—must affect the value of everything which men either sell or buy, because they must buy and sell with this variable, fluctuating, uncertain currency, or with reference to payment therein.

The currency of the country consists of greenbacks, national-bank notes, and fractional currency. Of the former there are outstanding over $380,000,000, about $350,000,000 in national-bank notes, and some $40,000,000 in fractional currency—making an aggregate of nearly $770,000,000, for the redemption of which the Government is responsible. Every dollar of this currency, under the promise, express or implied, of the Government, ought to-day to be convertible into coin at the pleasure of the holder; and yet the Government could not redeem one dollar in ten of the circulating medium it has issued and put in circulation, and for the redemption of which its faith has been pledged in the most solemn form.

The failure of the Government to provide the means for the redemption of the currency has depreciated it in value, and that depreciation is a loss to the amount of nearly one hundred millions of dollars upon the aggregate value of currency in circulation. One of the arguments urged in favor of the present form of currency—that is, currency issued by the Government and for the redemption of which it is responsible—is the security which it offered the holder of its ultimate payment. It may be true that the holder of greenbacks and national-bank notes can rely with certainty upon the ultimate payment of the notes in his possession, because the Government is pledged to their payment; but can he rely upon their payment according to their face value? No. All that he can depend upon is payment according to their value in the market. Suppose the Government to-day was to enter upon the redemption of greenbacks in coin, does any one suppose they would be redeemed at par? Certainly not; but only relatively to their value with gold in the market; and that value, that is, their marketable value, must of necessity depend upon the relative amount of the volume of the currency to the coin in the country with which it is to be redeemed. But in reference to the ultimate payment of the currency in coin by the Government, even relatively to its value in the market with gold, that may depend not so much upon the present disposition of the Government in good faith to redeem its promises as upon its future ability to do so.

And now, sir, while I am fully aware of the vast resources of this Government, of the immense revenues which are constantly pouring into its Treasury, of the cheerfulness with which the people of the country have submitted to the taxation which has been laid upon them, and hope never to see the day when the American people would be willing to see the plighted faith of their Government tarnished by the slightest failure to redeem every pledge made to foreign or domestic creditors, still I am not ignorant of the vast responsibilities of this Government, of its large indebtedness and the constant drain upon its resources, and that its ability to meet its responsibilities depends in no small degree upon the continued willingness of the people to submit to onerous taxation. I am not ignorant of the present urgent wants of the Treasury; of the large deficit which threatens to embarrass it, and which must be met by a rigid curtailment of expenditures or a resort to increased taxation upon the people.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] some days ago, in view of the wants of the Treasury, boldly advocated additional taxation, and said that between disgrace and taxation he was prepared to place burdens on the people. Well, sir, the people for years have bent their necks to the galling yoke, and may do so still; but let me say to the Senator that the people may become restive under burdens which it is much more easy to impose than to bear. My own opinion is that the people are already taxed too heavily, and that a curtailment of the ordinary expenditures of the Government had better be tried before increasing the burdens of the people by an increase of taxation.

Sir, I hope there is no necessity for either dishonor or increased taxation. If such a contingency exists a grave responsibility rests upon the party in power. That party found the country free from debt thirteen years ago, and has had control of every department of the Government ever since that time. Then the whole expenditures of the Government, including the support of the Army and Navy, the payment of pensions, and the appropriations for the Indians, did not exceed seventy-five or eighty million dollars. Now, sir, our expenditures since the close of the war, including interest on the public debt, will average over $300,000,000 annually. The Army in time of peace costs thirty or thirty-five millions. The appropriations for the Navy have been for the last four years more than $20,000,000 annually; and the Indian appropriations more than $7,000,000—about double the appropriations for the same purpose under any democratic administration; while a multitude of new offices have been created, wholly unnecessary for the public service, and solely for the purpose of rewarding party favorites. Let the party in power save the country from dishonor by curtailing expenditures, by abolishing unnecessary offices, by reducing the expenses of the Army and Navy, by revising the pension list, and protecting that fund from the frauds practiced upon it, and by a rigid economy in all public expenditures, and increased taxation will be unnecessary. The public faith need not be further tarnished nor the burdens of the people further increased if proper economy is used in the management of public affairs That economy is demanded not only by the apprehended deficit in the revenues, but also by the people of the country, restive under the taxation which has been imposed to support the extravagance which has marked the action of the Government for the last few years beyond anything in its previous history

My purpose, however, Mr. President, is not now to discuss the necessity and duty of an economical administration of public affairs, but to call attention to the fact that the taxing power of the Government, upon which the ultimate redemption of the currency depends, has been, and is now, exercised to the full extent which public sentiment in this country will justify or sustain.

But let us look, Mr. President, more in detail at our monetary or financial system. I have already said that coin is excluded from it. Specie forms no part of the system. The greenbacks are issued and put in circulation directly by the Government, without any intermediate agent. They are direct promises by the United States to pay to bearer the amount of the note which he may hold; and yet these promises remain unredeemed. The Government of the United States has failed to meet its promise to the holders of its paper, and hitherto has wholly neglected and refused, and still does neglect and refuse, to redeem its promise to the public, to the great scandal of the Government and the great injury of its creditors—the holders of its obligations.

Now, sir, the Government cannot be sued for the breach of its promises, but the moral obligation to redeem them is none the less binding; and the legislation of Congress should look to the redemption of these notes, in specie, at the earliest possible period. And just here let me say that the increase of this volume to any amount postpones, pro tanto, the day of their redemption.

But there is one other fact connected with the greenbacks which ought not to be overlooked. Each note is declared to be "a legal tender at its face value for all debts public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." I shall not now attempt to discuss the want of power in Congress to make anything but coin a legal tender. On that subject I have my own opinions; and do not hesitate to say, notwithstanding the decision of the reconstructed Supreme Court on that point, that my opinion remains firm and stable—unchanged and unchangeable—in opposition to any such power in Congress.

Another feature, however, of these greenbacks, to which I wish now to direct attention, is the dishonor which has been placed upon them by the Government itself. They have been issued with the declaration that they are not receivable in payment of duties on imports, nor can they be used in paying the interest on the public debt. They are thus dishonored by the Government, and necessarily thereby depreciated in value. While thus dishonoring its own paper and refusing to receive it in payment of certain public dues, the Government compels the citizens of the country to take these greenbacks at their face value, however depreciated, in all transactions between themselves. Thus we have furnished for the people an irredeemable depreciated currency, while the Government refuses to receive it in payment of duties on imports, and demands payment in gold.

How far the receipt of greenbacks in payment of duties on importations would have added to their value or promoted the interest of the country I shall not now discuss. I may be allowed, however, to say that it would have taken away the reproach justly charged upon the Government of compelling the people to accept a currency which it dishonors and repudiates itself.

I have already said that a part of our currency consisted of national-bank notes. I now desire to call attention for a few moments to the national banking system, organized under the authority of the Government, and forming an important part of the monetary or financial system of the country.

Those banks have been organized by purchasing and depositing with the Government United States bonds to the amount of the capital of the banks, the Government upon such deposit issuing to the banks 90 per cent. of the capital deposited in national-bank notes, and requiring a reserve of 15 per cent. of the amount of the notes delivered by the Government to be kept as a reserve by the banks, so that a bank thus organized has about 75 per cent. of its capital in notes on which to do business. I am not now speaking of the business which it may do on its deposits, for, like State banks, the national banks may discount upon their deposits. On the capital deposited with the Government in United States bonds the Government pays to the bank interest in gold out of the public Treasury, which forms a part of the dividends declared by the banks.

So far as the shareholders in these banks are concerned, this bonus or pension paid to them by the Government may be a very good thing. It increases largely their dividends and makes their investment profitable. In some instances they declare enormous dividends, as high as 15 and 20 per cent. But how is it with the public Treasury? Twenty-four million dollars in gold at least are annually collected from the people in taxes, to be distributed, in the shape of interest on their capital deposited with the Government, among the national banks of the country. Thus the labor, the industry, the people of the country, have been and are now being taxed directly for the benefit of capitalists. There is no disguising the fact. Twenty-four millions of dollars in gold are annually taken from the people by taxation and given directly to the stockholders in these national banks.

It may be said that the interest on the bonds must have been paid if held by other parties. My answer is that the national banks would have been organized if there had been a stipulation that no interest would be paid upon the bonds deposited with the Government. The franchise secured to the banks was a full equivalent for the interest on their capital. Without the interest paid to them by the Government the banks could make not only fair but large profits, equal at least to any other business in which capital is usually employed.

This large amount of interest paid to the national banks annually, amounting already in the aggregate, for the last eight or nine years, to something near $150,000,000 in gold, has proved a heavy drain upon the Treasury, and is nothing more nor less than a gratuity paid by the Government to persons engaged in the business of banking under the national banking system. And now let me inquire, what advantages have the people derived from these banks to compensate them for the taxes they pay to swell their dividends and enrich their shareholders? Have they brought more capital into the communities where located? Certainly not. Every dollar of the capital of any national bank has been taken out of the community and locked up in the Treasury of the United States, and the banks get in return but 90 per cent. of this capital in notes to take back in its place. Thus the community has lost 10 per cent. of the capital it had by the organization of the bank in its midst. If the capital of these national banks had been loaned out in the communities in which they are located, instead of being placed in the Treasury, it would have been of more advantage to the people than the facilities which these banks afford. Under the old banking system the capital of the banks remained in the communities where they were located and formed a part of the wealth of the State, and at the same time could be used for the relief of the people in time of financial embarrassment. Four hundred million dollars have been taken out of the business and wealth of the country and placed in the Treasury as the basis for the national banks, so that every one can see the establishment of this banking system has added nothing to the means of the public for the transaction of business.

Nor have the facilities afforded the public by these national banks proved an equivalent for the bonus paid out of the public Treasury for the benefit of their shareholders.

Under the old system of banking not only the capital of the banks remained in the communities where they were located, and furnished the means for the relief of the people in time of need, but the banks could in times of stringency issue their notes in excess of their capital for the accommodation of the public. Very frequently their issues were double their capital, thus furnishing the means required by the business and wants of the community. But how is it with the national banks of the country? Restricted in the amount of their issues, they can do nothing in time of stringency for the public relief, except what can be done upon their sum of deposits. These in the rural sections are necessarily small and furnish but little basis for accommodation by the banks. So that it is very apparent that the facilities furnished by the present system are much less than under the State-bank system before their circulation was destroyed by the tax imposed on their issues.

Under the old system, too, the circulation was local, and being redeemable, was returned from the cities and distant points to the bank, and was thus kept generally in the community where the banks were located. The notes, however, of the national banks have no local character. The Government being responsible for their payment, they pass everywhere, and seldom return to the bank which put them in circulation. I am aware that the fact that national-bank notes pass current in every part of the country is an argument pressed in favor of the system, and I am not disposed to deny that in one aspect it is an advantage to have such a currency; but in another view of the case it is a disadvantage. These notes being as current in one place as another, go to the commercial and business centers and are never returned to the bank that puts them in circulation, and the community there is frequently in want of money, while in the large cities and money centers there is a plethora of currency which seeks investment, not in the legitimate channels of business, but in speculative enterprises. If these notes had a local character and a value at home greater than at a distance, they would be returned occasionally, and thus enable the banks to furnish greater facilities for the accommodation of the communities where they are located.

Mr. President, at this point I want to correct a statement that was made a few days ago by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] in reference to the relative amount of currency under the old banking system and under the present system in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. The Senator was misled by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, who stated that in 1862 the bank circulation in the State of Delaware was $678,340, and that in 1873, under the national banking system, it was $1,296,615. If the honorable Senator from North Carolina had noticed the note to the report, he would have seen that the Comptroller there stated that the returns from several of the States, including Delaware, were not correct. At that time we had in the State of Delaware banks organized, with a paid-in capital of over a million and a half of dollars. We had in 1852 as I could show from the revised statutes of the State, which give a list of the State banks then in being in the State, with the amount of their capital, a banking capital paid in of over a million and a half. Subsequently to 1852 when the revised statutes of the State were published, several other State banks were incorporated, so that we really had not far from two millions of bank capital under the old State-bank system in Delaware at the time referred to; and under the law of that State the State banks could issue double the amount of their capital, so that we had nearly four millions of circulation. In 1862 we had a circulation of nearly four millions of the State banks as against a little over a million and a quarter now under the national-bank system. I simply make this correction of the error into which my friend fell in his remarks, so that the matter may be properly understood.

I now return to the discussion that I was on when I paused to make this correction of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina. What I have described is the monetary system of this country: an irredeemable, depreciated, fluctuating paper currency, worth less to-day by nearly $100,000,000 than it purports to be worth upon its face; a total absence of specie from the circulating medium, and the coin of the country an article of merchandise and speculation. To this monetary system can be traced much of the financial embarrassment of the people of this country. It has engendered the most reckless extravagance on the part of the Government as well as of the people. It has fostered and stimulated the wildest speculations and gambling in picture stocks, and led to a state of demoralization in official and private life without a parallel in the previous history of the country. I am aware that the advocates of this system contend that under it the country has prospered beyond precedent; but let me remind them that whatever prosperity the country enjoys is not attributable to a depreciated, irredeemable paper currency, but has been obtained despite the evils of such a currency; and that with a better financial system—with currency convertible into coin at all times—a much more substantial prosperity would have been obtained.

I doubt whether there is to-day more solid prosperity in the country than there was prior to the war. We are apt to forget the past and be captivated by the present; but if we turn back a few years in our history, we shall find that while we may not have spread so wide our phylacteries, and boasted so loudly of our progress in wealth and of our prosperity and greatness, that we as a people were not laggards in the march of progress, but enjoyed a degree of prosperity that rendered us the peer of the proudest nations of the earth. Hear what Bancroft says in his introduction to his History of the United States, written before the national banking system was in operation, and before the Government undertook to determine the character and fix the amount of the circulating medium of the country. Describing the prosperity of the country at the time his work was written, among other things, he says:

> New States are forming in the wilderness; canals, intersecting our plains and crossing our high-lands, open numerous channels to internal commerce; manufactures prosper along our water-courses; the use of steam on our rivers and railroads annihilates distance by the acceleration of speed. Our wealth and population, already giving us a place in the first rank of nations, are so rapidly cumulative, that the former is increased fourfold, and the latter is doubled in every period of twenty-two or twenty-three years. There is no national debt, the community is opulent, the Government economical, and the public Treasury full.

That was the statement of Mr. Bancroft, at the time he wrote his introduction to the History of the United States.

Sir, we have prospered; but much of the apparent prosperity of the country is deceptive. Our cities have grown rapidly and our manufacturing interests have increased. We have built railroads across the continent; erected costly edifices; and in the splendor of our equipages and the magnificence and luxury of living have rivaled the most opulent and wealthy nations of the Old World. But are we not to-day on the verge of bankruptcy? Look at our debts—our national debt, our State debts, our municipal debts, our corporation debts, our individual debts—and tell me, if you can, their amount. Sir, they baffle computation, and will prove an incubus on the industry of the country for centuries to come. Talk not to me about prosperity, when hundreds of thousands of the people of the country are out of employment; when business is prostrated; when creditors are exacting and debtors unable to pay; when the great agricultural interest of the land is unremunerative and complaining of the oppressions and exactions to which it is subject; when commerce is paralyzed, and your ship-building interest languishes, and from every quarter is heard the cry for relief. Sir, this state of things is in part the result of your monetary system, which has stimulated extravagance and reckless speculation, that have wrecked the greatest fortunes, and brought poverty and distress to the palaces of the great as well as the hovels of the poor.

But, Mr. President, while I believe that much of the financial embarrassment experienced by the country is the result of the monetary system of irredeemable depreciated currency fastened upon the country, and which has engendered and encouraged reckless extravagance and wild speculation and gambling in worthless fancy stocks, still I believe that the evils inherent in the system have been aggravated by the financial policy, if I may use that expression, pursued by the Government.

Passing by the extravagance everywhere observable in the management of public affairs—the multiplication of offices, the grants of subsidies, the maintenance of a large military establishment in time of peace, the fraudulent claims allowed for pensions, the waste of public money in the Indian appropriations and other expenditures which ought to be cut off and the people relieved from the taxation which they impose—let us look first at the action of Congress in the adjustment of the tariff upon foreign goods imported into the country.

Now, sir, to meet our indebtedness and carry on the Government we are compelled to have revenue; but true policy dictates that the burdens of the people and the restrictions upon trade should be as light as possible. Yet, sir, upon what principle are the tariff laws enacted? Are they not adjusted more with reference to the protection of certain manufacturing interests in New England and in other States than to the revenue to be derived under them? Sir, it is the standing reproach of our revenue laws, especially those which impose duties on foreign importations, that they are framed in the interest of particular classes, regardless of the injustice which is done to all other portions of the country. This protective system not only compels the people of the country to pay the large amount of revenue derived from customs, but it exacts from them a much larger tribute for the benefit of the protected classes. I have not taken the trouble to ascertain the amount of domestic goods consumed, as compared with those imported from abroad; but it is certain the former is much greater than the latter. The consumers pay not only the duties on the foreign goods imported to the Government, but also the enhanced price of the domestic goods which protection under our tariff laws enables the manufacturer to exact. This tribute exacted from the people for the benefit of the protected classes, in addition to the heavy revenue paid in the shape of duties to the Government, is one of the sources of present embarrassment. It is a constant drain upon the resources of the people of the country, and one to which they ought not to be subjected. Congress ought at once to remedy the evil, and adjust our revenue laws so as to raise the necessary means for the Government without regard to the protection of favored classes.

But, sir, not only has the legislation of Congress in the enactment of our tariff laws contributed to the embarrassment of the country, but the financial policy pursued by the executive department has, in my judgment, been most unfortunate, and contributed much to the derangement of our monetary affairs. Within the last five years we have collected, upon an average, little less than $200,000,000 in gold annually in duties on imports. I do not know the precise amount of that sum required to pay the interest on our bonded debt, but it could not have exceeded in the five years $650,000,000. The residue, with the exception of the gold reserve kept in the Treasury, has been sold from time to time, and the proceeds applied partly to the purchase of bonds and the reduction of the public debt. This, in my opinion, was a mistake, not to say a blunder. Had the gold received from duties on importations not required to pay interest on the public debt been applied to the redemption of the greenbacks they would have approximated in value to coin and rendered the resumption of specie payments easy and natural. In fact if this had been done we would, in all probability, have had specie payments before this time. The policy pursued may have had the effect to strengthen our credit abroad, but it has had the effect to weaken it at home. The foreign creditor may have been benefited by the enhancement of the price of the Government bonds which he held; but the greenbacks and national-bank notes, for the redemption of which the Government is responsible, and which ought now to be redeemable in coin, have been kept far below par, when they might by a different policy have been almost or quite equal in value to coin. I have already spoken of the loss to the country by the depreciation of the currency, and will not now dwell on that point; but I may be allowed to say that the slight enhancement of the value of our bonds in the foreign markets by the policy pursued is no compensation for the great loss sustained by the depreciation of our currency at home, and which by a different policy might have been prevented.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to show that the cause of the financial embarrassment of the country is chargeable to our monetary system—from which specie is excluded—consisting of an irredeemable, depreciated paper currency, and to the financial policy pursued by the Government.

I now propose to notice some of the remedies suggested in this debate for the difficulties admitted to exist, and which all seem anxious to relieve.

Several Senators who have preceded me in this debate seem to think that the true remedy can only be found in an increase of the volume of the currency. The late monetary crisis, which locked up for a time much of the circulating medium, seems to have impressed them with the idea that there is a scarcity of currency in the country, and that nothing but an additional amount of greenbacks can restore confidence and bring back a healthy normal condition to the business of the country. I cannot subscribe to this view. The discrepancy between the volume of currency and the coin in the country is already too great. The depreciation in the currency is in no small degree attributable to that fact; and just in the same ratio in which that discrepancy is increased will be the increase in the depreciation of the value of the currency.

The inflation of the paper money of the country will have another effect, namely, to increase the prices of commodities in every market; because the purchasing power of the currency will be lessened by its expansion. Experience has shown that the merchant, the manufacturer, the tradesman, all advance the price of their goods just as the money in which they are paid becomes lessened in value. They can protect themselves, in a measure, against loss by reason of the depreciation of currency. But there is one class of our population that has no means to protect itself in this regard. The agriculturists of the country, especially the farmers who produce cereals, do not fix the prices of their products, but are compelled to sell at prices fixed by others. These prices are fixed at the very lowest figures that will secure the quantity of cereals desired to supply the demand, and are no higher than they would be if paid in gold. In fact, the prices of farm productions for the last few years are not as high as they frequently were when paid for in specie or its equivalent.

With these facts known to exist; with farm products depressed and the farming community everywhere complaining of hard times; and that their business is less remunerative than when we had specie payments, is it not surprising that Senators representing agricultural sections of the country should insist on an inflation of the currency, when its only effect will be to depress still further the farming interest, by inflating the prices of all they buy, without advancing in the least the prices of the grain they sell? My friend, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] the other day said he wanted cheap money. I suppose he meant such an abundance of paper money that it could be obtained on easy terms. The process of cheapening money in the sense of making it abundant has often been tried, and always with the same result—depreciating it in value, and rendering its purchasing power less.

Cheapening the currency by its expansion and the increase of its volume may be dissimilar in process, but will not be found to be very dissimilar in results from the old mode of cheapening money by debasing coin. That process has been repeatedly tried, and I beg to call attention to one instance in Spanish history in the time of Henry IV, which illustrates the position that the cheaper and more abundant you make money the less value it has, while everything else is increased and inflated in price. I read from Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella, volume 1, page 69. In describing many of the evils of the reign of Henry IV, he says:

> But, perhaps, the most crying evil of this period was the shameless adulteration of the coin. Instead of five royal mints, which formerly existed, there were now one hundred and fifty in the hands of authorized individuals, who debased the coin to such a deplorable extent that the most common articles of life were enhanced in value three, four, and even six fold. Those who owed debts eagerly anticipated the season of payment; and, as the creditors refused to accept it in the depreciated currency it became a fruitful source of litigation and tumult, until the whole nation seemed on the verge of bankruptcy.

That was the effect of cheapening money at that time by debasing the coin.

Mr. GORDON. Will my friend from Delaware allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. He totally misapprehended me if he supposed I wanted to deteriorate money in order to make it cheap. I think if he will read my remarks carefully, he will see that I maintained that a bill passed by this Congress giving us the character of currency I wanted would make that currency equal to gold, but that I wanted cheap money as England has cheap money—cheap interest.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I certainly understood the honorable Senator in his remarks the other day to insist upon having a greater volume of the currency, upon having an increase of the volume of the circulating medium. He wanted it, as I understood, so very abundant that the interest would necessarily be reduced upon money. I have not designedly misrepresented my friend from Georgia, but I wish to trace out the logical consequences of the position which he assumed in reference to this increase of the volume of the currency. I say to him and to the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] who so eloquently described the condition of the South and West, that if they could procure what they consider so much needed by those sections—a large increase of currency—they would not realize what they desire, a permanent increase of the circulating medium in their midst. If the banking capital of these States was increased, the circulation of those banks would not remain long in these States, but would seek the money centers and remain there, leaving these States minus the capital placed in the Treasury as the security for the redemption of the bank circulation, while these issues would fly to the four winds of heaven. What has become of the $27,000,000 of reserve issued by the Secretary of the Treasury without warrant of law, as I conceive? Did it do the South any good, or the West any good? No. It went directly to the money centers, to New York and other cities, where money is now abundant, while the rural sections are destitute. Such would be the result if you increase the currency $100,000,000; and such will be the result if the pending amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina shall prevail.

But to return from this digression. Not only is the agricultural community greatly injured by the inflation of prices consequent upon a depreciation in the currency, and therefore interested in a speedy return to specie payments, but the vast multitudes who live on salaries and wages, the toiling millions who eat their bread by the sweat of their brow, all are losers by a depreciated paper currency and consequent high prices of the necessaries of life for which their scanty earnings must be expended. And can we be indifferent to the wants of the masses, the men and women who plod the weary paths of toil, struggling for the bare sustenance of life, and laboring on day after day to support themselves and those dependent upon them? Shall we favor a policy that will increase their burdens by rendering more dear the few comforts they can procure with their limited means?

The expansion of the currency will do this without advancing materially the wages paid them for their labor. They are not indifferent to our action here. The voice of discontent comes up from the multitudes that throng the humbler walks of life. Mingled in the discordant sound are heard not only the unreasonable demands of an agrarian spirit, but the appeals extorted from the virtuous poor by penury and want. Those appeals may not be disregarded, we may not "send the multitude away," but must "give them to eat," not by multiplying the loaves and fishes, not by supplying the wants from the public Treasury or from the hand of charity, but by restoring a sound currency, and thereby cheapening the necessaries of life, now exorbitantly high by reason of the depreciation of the currency. Bring back the circulating medium to a specie basis, and the cost of living will be reduced. Stability will be secured to business, employment furnished to those now idle, and the murmurings of discontent will no longer be heard among the masses. The highest duty of statesmanship is to render the people happy and contented, and that can best be accomplished by securing them regular employment and reducing the cost of living. I know of no better way to accomplish such results than by making the currency equivalent to coin.

Mr. President, there is one other effect sure to follow an increase in the volume of the currency which is self-evident and need not be enforced by argument. It is this: it necessarily postpones the return to specie payments. If with the present circulation the Government is unable to redeem its promises, will not a further increase of the currency render it still less able? We have now a paper currency of over $750,000,000, while the whole amount of coin in the country is estimated at about $150,000,000. If every dollar of this coin belonged to the Government, it would only be able to redeem one-fifth of the currency for which it is responsible. Is it not evident, therefore, that a further increase of the currency must of necessity defer the time when the resumption of specie payments can be anticipated?

And now, sir, is it not desirable to return to specie payments? Can you hope to have any improvement in the financial affairs of this country while the circulating medium is fluctuating in value, and liable to be still further depreciated by the combinations of capitalists and speculators? Gold coin is the recognized standard throughout the world by which values are determined and measured, and until we get back to this standard, until we place our currency upon a basis where its value will approximate to coin, we must expect not only depreciation and fluctuation in its value but a corresponding fluctuation in the values of every species of property. Stability in values is essential to a healthy condition in business, and without it there can be no security or safety even for the most prudent and careful business man in the country.

I have no sympathy with those who are ready to renounce gold as the true standard of value in this country, and who believe that any other standard which might be ordered by Congress would be as effectual for the determination of values as the precious metals. Such an idea ignores the common judgment of mankind in all parts of the world as the proper substance for the measurement of values, and if attempted to be put into practice would prove as ineffectual and ruinous as it is visionary and delusive in theory.

I turn now, Mr. President, to another remedy suggested in this debate—one that was enforced in a very able argument by the chairman of the Finance Committee at the last session, and which is certainly favored in his exhaustive and able speech delivered during this debate on the resolution reported from the Finance Committee. That remedy is to secure to the holders of greenbacks the right to convert them at their option into interest-bearing bonds. Sir, to this remedy I am opposed. I concur in the views of the chairman of the Finance Committee as to the obligation of the Government to redeem its promises; but, sir, its promise was not to redeem its greenbacks by bonds bearing interest, but to pay them in money—that is, in coin. We have, Mr. President, already an interest-bearing debt sufficiently large, and I can see no propriety in converting a debt bearing no interest into one upon which interest would be to pay. It is no part of the contract between the Government and the holders of its notes, and would be a gratuity by the Government to its creditors which it is ill able to make. Having discussed this proposition at the last session, I now content myself with the simple announcement of my opposition to this plan without discussing it at length.

Mr. President, I do not concur in the view expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] He said in his speech on the resolution referred to, that—

> There is no obligation expressed, and I think none implied, in what is written upon the greenback that it is to be paid at a particular time. It is redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, but not payable at any particular moment.

Now, sir, according to my understanding of a legal obligation, none stronger could possibly exist than is contained on the face of the greenbacks themselves. The United States promises to pay to bearer the amount of the notes, without any reservation as to time; and if a direct promise to pay can raise a legal or moral obligation to pay, then the obligation, legal and moral, is perfect, and cannot be frittered away by argument or impaired by suggestion. The Government cannot be sued; the obligation cannot be enforced; but it is none the less binding, and ought to be admitted even if the Government is unable to fulfill it. Nor can I agree with the Senator that we should simply hold fast whereunto we have attained. In my judgment we should do something more; we should begin at the earliest possible moment to redeem the currency which the Government has issued.

I am fully aware that the Government is not in a condition to redeem at once all or any great part of the currency for which it is responsible; but I am equally aware that it has at present in the Treasury a considerable reserve in gold, and that it annually collects from customs a large amount of coin in excess of the amount required to pay the interest on the public debt. Let this excess be applied from time to time, as it accumulates, to the redemption of the greenbacks, under such regulations as may be necessary to do justice to the holders of the currency—and at no very distant day you will have placed the circulating medium upon a basis that will approximate its value to specie, and that by such a gradual process as not seriously to disturb values which will naturally accommodate themselves to the changed condition of the currency. Let the Government redeem, as soon as it can, every obligation which it owes in the shape of greenbacks. Let it sever its connection with the national banks of the country, and leave to the people under State regulations the management of the banks, and the supply of whatever currency the business of the country may require, and in my opinion you will have a more healthy and sounder financial system than the present. The Government itself will be less embarrassed, and the business of the country less liable to be disturbed by revulsions and panics. To any measure which looks to a return to specie payments at the earliest possible period, to the ultimate redemption and retirement of the greenbacks, and the complete and final divorce of the Government from the banking institutions of the country, I shall give an earnest and most cordial support.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] to strike out "25" and insert "50," before "million," in line 12 of the third section; upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I have to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Finance that, inasmuch as the question involved here is one that we all concede to be exceedingly important, and to be followed by a vote on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and inasmuch as many Senators are absent, it might be as well to take this vote on Monday and have it understood that the vote shall be then taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed that a night's reflection, without any debate, would have convinced every Senator who desires to secure to the West and South some bank circulation, that we had better take the proposition as offered by the Committee on Finance, or at least take a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and let the amount agreed on be taken from the present currency, because it is so obvious to anybody accustomed to the forms of legislation in the Senate, perfectly manifest, what the amendment will be. I can tell the Senator beforehand just as well as afterward that if the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina should be adopted, and you ingraft on this bill a proposition to increase the aggregate of the currency, you will not get a vote on that bill for a long time. It would raise the whole question of inflation, and you would destroy that which I believe is the only opportunity which will be presented, for awhile at least, until we discuss the question more fully, to give to the South and West more bank circulation.

Now, when the Senators from the South and West seem to be willing to agree to a proposition that for the time at least, until we can discuss the matter further, will give relief to their constituents by taking some of the existing bank circulation from the East and organizing banks in the South and West, I should suppose they would be satisfied with that and would not embarrass it by this other proposition.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. He will perceive at once the embarrassing position in which his request puts the Senators not only from the South but from the West, who do not believe the present amount of currency sufficient. He places us in the position of either declining what the Finance Committee offer us, or of taking from New England a portion of what she claims she really needs. The position we assume is this: that if the East has no more than it requires, then it is patent to all that the demands of the West and of the South cannot consistently be refused.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that point.

Mr. GORDON. Let me repeat that the Senator will perceive that he places us in the position of refusing what the Finance Committee offer, or else of doing what we deem an injustice to the East in taking from them what they have lawfully obtained, and what they claim is but adequate to their wants.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the question is a question of injustice to the East, I will submit it to the Senators from the New England States to say whether they would not surrender the circulation that will be taken from them under the operation of the bill reported from the Committee on Finance rather than raise the question of the increase of bank circulation; and I would leave it to them without saying a word. I have no doubt of their answer.

Now let me say another thing in reply to the observation of the Senator from Georgia. The Senator seems to think that if this bill passes there is the end of the subject. I have assured the Senate, so far as one man can, representing the proposition reported by the Committee on Finance, that at the very earliest moment, as soon as the naval appropriation bill is passed, I will myself call up the resolution of the Committee on Finance and desire a vote, and will press a vote upon it, if the Senate will stand by me, to the exclusion of everything else, until a vote is had on that resolution. Then the Senate will decide the question whether or not they want more paper money.

Now, the question simply is whether the West and South shall have an opportunity to organize local banks immediately after the passage of this act, rather than to await a long, troublesome, and complicated discussion upon general financial topics, with the almost certain probability that if the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina should pass the Senate, it could not be until after a long and weary debate, and that it would be disagreed to in the House, where the feeling is against the proposition of increasing the bank circulation and rather in favor of increasing the greenback circulation. Thus the result would be very much like that in the case of the dog crossing the stream having secured a good chunk of beef; but he saw a shadow in the river below him, dropped the beef, and grasped at the shadow. That is just the position in which the Senators from the West and South seem to be placing themselves here. They have a bill before them now, which by common consent cures a local grievance. It does not go far enough, they say; but they can secure this much, by common consent—even by the consent of the New England

Senators, for I would leave it to them. They might vote against it, although if they were called upon they would prefer it to what lies beyond. After getting this much, they have the power and the right, if they have a majority, to carry more; but if they have not a majority, they will not get any more.

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator from Ohio understood me to express a willingness to accept the twenty-five millions proposed by this bill in case New England should be willing to surrender it, he misunderstood me. If New England Senators upon this floor will state that she is ready to surrender to the South and West all her surplus, and make an absolutely equal or equitable distribution of the funds according to population and production, then I am prepared to vote for the measure. I do not desire to put New England in that position. For one I desire New England to retain what she claims is now only a sufficiency of circulation; but I desire that the same sufficiency shall be granted to the West and South.

While I am on my feet I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa to withdraw, temporarily at least, his amendment, in order that I may come within the rules and offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment which I desire to propose gives the same amount of increase proposed by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; but it distributes it to those States, and to those States only, which now are deficient in currency, and which have not their proportion.

I strengthen this appeal to the Senator from Iowa by the remark that it would meet precisely the views expressed by that Senator when on the floor last, that the increase, whatever it might be, should be distributed to the States whose quota was now less than was due according to their population and wealth.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will my friend indulge me a moment?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. My proposed substitute is to accomplish what he desires, as it has been modified.

Mr. GORDON. I did not so understand the Senator's substitute. I will ask that it be read, that I may understand it precisely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That $46 000,000 in notes for circulation in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national banking associations now organized, or which may be organized hereafter, and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. GORDON. That refers to a section in another act.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will read for the Senator's information that very act which increased the circulation $54,000,000, being the act of July 12, 1870:

And the amount of notes so provided shall be furnished to banking associations organized, or to be organized, in those States and Territories having less than their proportion under the apportionment contemplated by the provisions of the "act to amend an act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved March 3, 1865, and the bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, to secure the additional circulating notes herein authorized, shall be of any description of bonds of the United States bearing interest in coin.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. I understand precisely the bearing, and I see that it does meet the point that I make. But I submit to the Senator himself that it would be better simply to state in words what the intention of the amendment is, instead of requiring those who wish to understand it to hunt up some other law to ascertain the meaning of this. I will read to the Senator the amendment I propose. Strike out all after "that," and insert:

From and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes, in the manner now provided by law, to associations organized, or to be organized, in States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation under an apportionment made on the basis of population and wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870, to the extent of forty-six millions.

This amendment simply puts it in words, and saves the trouble of referring to another law to find the meaning of this.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have adopted the method I have pursued, because the words in the act referred to have already been construed and are well understood, and we do not run into the danger of causing trouble by using new terms. These words have already been construed and are well understood. The new language must be construed again, though I believe that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia accomplishes the same end.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator accept that instead of requiring a vote on it? But it is not worth while to waste words about it; I shall not insist upon it. I wish, though, while I am on my feet, that I may not seem to be inconsistent with myself, to state that I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina if we can get a vote upon it; but I vote for it with the distinct declaration that it neither provides the amount nor the character of circulation which I desire. I vote for it simply because it will give a temporary relief to the sections which are now suffering for the want of sufficient circulating medium. I maintain that it is not a sufficient increase and that it is not the character of currency which the country needs. I maintain, further, that no amount of increase, while the volume remains fixed and inflexible, can give permanent relief to the country. I desire to see a different currency, a really national currency, with the elastic feature which convertible and reconvertible bonds will give to it; yet in order to bring together all those who are agreed that the present volume of the currency is insufficient, I am willing to support that proposition.

I desire to see a currency founded upon an entirely different basis—upon the credit of the Government itself—in order that whatever benefits or profits accrue from loss of bills, interest upon bonds, &c., shall accrue to the people. But I will support, however, as stated, the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; and I appeal to my friend from Iowa to withdraw his amendment, in order that the friends of increase may come together and vote upon this question intelligently and without embarrassment. If, however, the Senator from Iowa refuses, then I shall be constrained to do what I do not wish to do—vote to deprive New England of a portion of the circulation which she claims is only now sufficient for her industries.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, it appears to me that the fairest thing which can be done is to refuse to make this amendment, and let the bill stand, by which $25,000,000 will be withdrawn from the New England and Northern States; and if, in connection with that, or after that, we can have a free-banking law—a law by which banks can be established in all sections of the country, and those banks be required to redeem their notes, not in coin, but in legal-tender notes, and then require the Government to redeem those legal-tender notes in 5 per cent. bonds, it appears to me you would have a system of banking which would give facilities to every section of the country in accordance with the demands of their business. On that idea, I should hope that those who are now opposing this bill, as reported by the Committee on Finance, will withdraw their opposition, and allow the bill to pass with the twenty-five million provision.

Mr. CAMERON. I would move an adjournment if I were not aware that I could make no remarks on a motion of that kind. I desire to offer an amendment to the Senate somewhat different from any that has been offered, because I cannot vote for the bill of the Senator from Ohio as it is. I think, in place of bringing relief, it will bring disaster and ruin to a great part of the country. There is no relief in it, to my mind; nor do I like very much any of the amendments that have been offered. I think they are all temporary in their character, all calculated to relieve the pain of the patient for the moment, but to bring greater disease, and probably death, afterward. I think, if we legislate at all on the currency of the country, it ought to be general legislation, that which shall reach every portion of the country—every State, and every Territory, and every county, and every township, in the whole land. You cannot do that by any of this temporary legislation.

I have had a great deal of experience in banking; but I do not pretend to be a doctor that can cure all financial diseases. I have no panacea. I know that this country is governed very much by common sense. I believe that no man who reflects upon the subject will be convinced that taking twenty-five or fifty millions of banking circulation from New England, or New York, or any place else, and planting it in the West, will do any good. Such an idea is an entire delusion. If you could send the capital along with the banks, it would do service wherever it goes, because capital is the enlivening element which produces prosperity in business.

Our country is different from all other countries of the world; and yet we legislate from the books written long ago in European countries which are entirely unlike ours. We have an immense uncultivated region, full of enterprising manhood, full of industry, full of patriotism, and full of everything which brings wealth to a new country except capital. True, we have one sort of capital, which after all is the best capital. Our people have industry, and they have muscle, and they have nerve, and they have endurance enough to be content to go into the wilderness and give their labor to make the country prosperous. But they want some money capital with all this.

Now, all our capital in this country has arisen from this myth of banking. We had no money when our people fought Great Britain, and by the experiment of paper dollars conquered the armies of the world. They made the proudest and the richest nation of the world give way to them. After awhile, when we found ourselves without roads, the people of the townships issued the scrip of the township to make township roads; and after awhile again the States made State roads; and then the General Government allowed us to make canals and roads through the whole country. That was all done with paper money. A few people suffered because of the loss of bank-notes; but a very few compared with the numerous persons who made fortunes from the prosperity created by that fictitious capital.

The national banking system corrects the evils of the old banking system, because it makes the Government responsible for the circulation of the banks. The Government, in the day of her trouble and her trial, asked the banks of the country to give her their money and throw up their old and very prosperous charters for the benefit of the country, and they did so. And the banks saved the country; for unless the banks of the day had issued their notes and taken the Government bonds as security, the Government could not have made the fight with these brave people who are a part of ourselves, and who might have conquered us if they had had the wealth that we had. I do not believe they would, though. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, my proposition will be something like this: to so extend the benefits of the national banking system as to take away the prejudice now existing against it, and which it incurs by reason of being called a monopoly. Sir, when the banks of the States were persuaded to adopt this national system they were invoked to do so in the name of patriotism. They were asked to forego the great profits they had made under the old State system for the purpose of saving the country. Why, sir, I had a little bank then with a capital of $200,000, under which I kept out in circulation and honestly paid from $800,000 to $1,000,000. Nobody doubted the notes which my bank issued, because they believed I would redeem them. Now that same bank has a circulation of $160,000. You talk about the profit of the national banks and about their being a monopoly! Why, sir, what monopoly was there in giving up the Bank of Middletown for the National Bank of Middletown? I only mention that as a sample of all the banks of the country.

Now, sir, I think we had better adjourn, because I do not believe that any three men here have got a plan upon which any other three will unite. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the motion is put, I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether the proposition that he intends to offer will be as a substitute for the whole bill?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I wish to ask further, whether the proposition that he intends to offer is to take off the restrictions that are now thrown around the national banks, so as to extend the privileges now given to national banks to all other associations?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. CONOVER. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will withdraw his motion to adjourn. I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON. I withdraw it for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania withdraws his motion, and the Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 13, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; let us have a Saturday session for debate. I move that the House sit for debate only to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that the House will attend to business to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. O, now you know you are going home yourself.

Mr. DAWES. No; I am not.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; let us first take a vote on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. YOUNG.]

The question was taken on Mr. YOUNG's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 46, noes 51.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 59.

Mr. RUSK. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to move that we have a session to-morrow for debate only, as I understand the motion of the gentleman from Georgia has been agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It has not been agreed to, as the yeas and nays have been called upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask, then, that by unanimous consent we hold a session to-morrow, for debate only.

The SPEAKER. That cannot cut off the right of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RUSK] to have the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. YOUNG.] The Chair, however, will submit the question: Is there objection to holding a session for debate to-morrow?

Mr. HURLBUT and Mr. HENDEE objected.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays; and twenty-five members voted in the affirmative; not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RUSK and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 90.

So (one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a parliamentary question. If the motion to adjourn over prevails, will it then be in order for me to make a motion that we have a session for debate to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will be possible, but only by unanimous consent.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia; and there were—yeas 125, nays 107, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Caldwell, Cessna, John B. Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. BLOUNT said: I desire to state that Mr. COOK, my colleague, is unable, on account of sickness, to attend the sessions of the House.

CONTRACTS FOR RECOVERING TAXES.

Mr. FOSTER. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back the resolution referred to them, which was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and to recommend the adoption of the following substitute therefor:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House with full copies of all contracts made under the authority of the Treasury Department in pursuance of one of the provisions of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, approved May 8, 1872; and also copies of all schedules and correspondence and orders of the Department relative to said contracts; and also the amount of money paid in under said contracts, and by whom and under which contract paid.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When this resolution was reported the other day I objected to it. I only desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that it would bring before the country the names of a great many persons who have simply been accused on ex parte testimony. I will withdraw my objection, and I trust to make such discussion of this matter as may be necessary upon a bill which may be introduced upon the subject.

No objection being made the report was received, the substitute adopted, and the resolution, as amended, adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEY OF UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. AVERILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House the report of survey recently made upon the Upper Mississippi River, between Minneapolis and Saint Cloud, under the direction of General A. A. Humphreys, Chief of Engineers.

AGREEMENTS WITH INDIANS.

Mr. AVERILL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Indian Affairs the following communications; which were ordered to be printed, and recommitted:

A communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting an agreement with the Jicarilla Apaches and certain Ute Indians, in the Territory of New Mexico; and

A communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to an agreement concluded November 7, 1873, with the Bannock and other Indians, in South Idaho.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 21, 1874, with the accompanying reports, concerning the immigration service and the better protection of immigrants to the United States, be printed for the use of the House.

REFUNDING OF CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to give notice that on Monday next I will report from the Committee on Ways and Means, and ask action thereon on that day, a bill restricting the refunding of customs duties and prescribing certain regulations of the Treasury Department.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RUSK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at eighteen minutes before one o'clock. This being Friday, the first business in order during the morning hour will be reports of a private nature from committees.

W. W. HANDLIN.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely upon the petition of W. W. Handlin; and the same was laid on the table.

ROSE HILL CEMETERY.

Mr. FRYE, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 911) to relinquish title of the United States in certain real estate near Columbia, Tennessee, to Rose Hill Cemetery.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, provides that whatever title the United States may have acquired in and to a portion of the ground held and owned by Rose Hill Cemetery, a corporation so known under the laws of the State of Tennessee, by virtue of a contract and agreement made and entered into May, 1866, by the officers of said cemetery, on behalf of said corporation, and G. W. Marshall, captain and assistant quartermaster-general United States volunteers, on behalf of the United States, shall be released, quit-claimed, and set over to the president and directors of said corporation and their successors in office, to be by them held, as though said agreement and conveyance had not been made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ought not this bill to be first considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to make a statement. During the war there was a piece of Rose Hill Cemetery purchased by the United States in which to bury their dead. All those dead have now been removed, and that portion of the cemetery abandoned by the United States. This bill is merely to restore that small piece of the cemetery to the original owners. The whole of the land is worth nothing except for a burying-ground.

Mr. FRYE. And the only consideration given by the United States for this property was simply to repair a fence that had been destroyed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will make no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROADS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. FRYE, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1937) for the relief of the State of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The preamble of the bill states that the Government of the United States holds three bonds, signed by the governor of the State of Tennessee, dated the 1st day of June, 1866; one for $3,037,993.73, another for $94,142.85, and the other for $21,661.73, all bearing interest at the rate of 7.3 per cent. per annum, and payable to the United States of America, for property and railway material purchased by the Edgefield and Kentucky, and the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville Railroads, and all of them entitled to credits for certain mail-service, which is not in dispute; and that the State of Tennessee claims an abatement in the amount of said bonds, and alleges as a reason therefor that the property was purchased by receivers in charge of said roads for the use and benefit of the companies then owning them, and at extravagant prices, and said State, after the property was placed in the possession of the companies, executed the bonds aforesaid, to prevent the stopping of said roads, by a seizure and removal of the rolling-stock from said roads by the officers and agents of the United States Government; and that, inasmuch as said companies are utterly insolvent and unable to pay any part of said bonds, the State should only be charged with the actual value of the property at the date of the sale.

The first section of the bill provides that the Secretary of War of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Attorney-General of the United States, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed and required to settle with the State of Tennessee all demands between said State and the United States Government in any of its Departments; and, in doing so, he will only charge said State with the actual value of the property for which said bonds were given at the date of purchase, that value to be ascertained by proof or by the agreement of said officers and the agents of said State; and that any reduction so made shall be applied as a credit on said bonds, without interest.

The second section provides that the act shall take effect when its provisions shall have been accepted by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, by an act pledging the performance of the award or decision made under it, at the session of the Legislature next after the passage of this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill seems to be in the nature of an appropriation of property.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order on the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I do not know whether the objection will be against this bill or not. It simply authorizes the settlement of certain indebtedness of the State of Tennessee to the United States.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made, the Chair thinks the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the Speaker rule that this bill, which merely authorizes the proper officers to settle a debt due the Government, comes within the rule requiring that bills making appropriations shall be sent to the Committee of the Whole? This bill cannot possibly involve an appropriation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts It is only to ascertain what money the United States has received.

Mr. MAYNARD. Exactly; to ascertain how much shall be paid to the United States.

The SPEAKER. The point of the bill is this: The United States holds certain bonds of the State of Tennessee for a certain value; the proposition in the bill is to reduce that value and take a less amount. Clearly to that extent the bill makes an appropriation of public property, and under the rules it must receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole, not on the Private Calendar, but on the state of the Union.

DEBTS DUE FROM SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1938) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. The preamble states that the Secretary of War was directed and authorized by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, to compromise certain suits instituted by the United States against certain railroad corporations which purchased material from the Quartermaster's Department, under the provisions of executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865; and that issues have been raised and are pending in the settlement of the accounts of other railroad corporations which made purchases under said orders and against which the Government has not commenced suit. The bill therefore authorizes the Secretary of War, by and with the advice of the Attorney-General of the United States, to compromise, adjust, and settle the same upon such terms as may be equitable and just, and best calculated to promote the interests of the United States.

Mr. FRYE. I presume the same point raised against the last bill will lie against this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

JOAB BAGLEY.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 294) for the relief of Joab Bagley.

The bill was read. It recites in the preamble that it is alleged that, on the 13th day of September, 1858, under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1855, land warrant numbered 95116, for one hundred and twenty acres of land, was issued to one James McAdory, and by him afterward duly sold and assigned to Joab Bagley, a citizen of Jefferson County, in the State of Alabama, who, on the 21st day of September, 1862, located the said land warrant in the purchase of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter and the south half of the northeast quarter of section 6, township 18, range 2 west, in the Tuscaloosa land district, in the State of Alabama; which said location of said land warrant is alleged to have been made in good faith, but under a law (or pretended law) of the State of Alabama, authorizing the location of land warrants in said State; that it is alleged that the land warrant has been lost or destroyed, and that the same has not been returned to or filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but that notice of the loss thereof has been given to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The bill therefore provides that upon the payment by Joab Bagley of the minimum price to the proper officer of the Government of the United States for said land, to wit, southwest quarter of the southwest quarter and the south half of the northeast quarter of section 6, township 18, range 2 west, in the Tuscaloosa land district, in the State of Alabama, as by law required, estimating the land warrant at its value, $1.25 per acre, the balance to be paid in cash, the title to the said real estate be confirmed in Bagley, his heirs and assigns; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is authorized and required to issue letters-patent conveying the title to Bagley. The second section provides that the act shall not impair, make void, or in any way interfere with any prior valid claim to the real estate in the preceding section described.

Mr. RUSK. I make the point of order that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point. The bill will be so referred.

Mr. WHITE. This bill contains no appropriation. It merely provides that Joab Bagley shall be allowed the privilege of entering certain lands named in the bill; and his application for relief is based upon the facts stated in the preamble, the evidence of which, as adduced before the committee, was sufficient to satisfy them that the bill ought to be reported favorably. In 1862 Joab Bagley entered those lands in the State of Alabama, using a United States land warrant in part, and paying the balance in money.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order lies against the bill. It proposes to divest the United States of certain property for a consideration. As the point of order is insisted upon the Chair must sustain it. The bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

CRAWFORD M. HALL.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely upon the memorial of Crawford M. Hall, late district attorney of the eastern district of Tennessee; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

JAMES L. COLLINS.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1939) for the relief of James L. Collins; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that Hamilton G. Fant, William Craig, John S. Watts, Vincent St. Vrain, and William W. Mills, sureties of James L. Collins, deceased, upon his official bond as late receiver of public moneys and as designated depositary at Santa Fé, New Mexico, their heirs and legal representatives, be released and discharged from all liability on said bond and from the judgment recovered thereon in favor of the United States. The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, on final adjustment and settlement of the accounts of James L. Collins, deceased, late receiver and United States designated depositary of public moneys at Santa Fé, New Mexico, to pass to his credit the amount of money stolen from the United States depositary at Santa Fé after the murder of Collins on the night of June 5, 1869, and for which a judgment was recovered in the district court of New Mexico in favor of the United States against the sureties of Collins, or part of them, for $32,561.03, and $6,032.32 interest, and to pay to the legal representatives of Collins, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum, not exceeding $1,168.18, as may be shown to have been due and owing him at the time of his murder.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE P. FISHER.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, also from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1171) for the relief of George P. Fisher, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the sum of $576.25 be, and the same is thereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse George P. Fisher for his costs and expenses incurred in defending suits at law brought against him by Joseph H. Bradley, in the year 1868, for acts done by said Fisher while in the discharge of his duty as a justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding the criminal court of said District.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not that bill, making an appropriation, go, under the ruling of the Chair, to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The bill is open to the point of order.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

SALARIES.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1354) fixing the salaries of certain officers, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The motion was agreed to.

SURETIES OF THE LATE JESSE J. SIMKINS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the sureties of Jesse J. Simkins, deceased, late collector and public depositary at the port of Norfolk, Virginia, be, and they are thereby, released and discharged from a judgment rendered in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, against said sureties and in favor of the United States of America, on the 10th day of January, 1871.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the House will indulge me for a moment in a statement of this bill, perhaps the point of order will not lie or will not be raised. Simkins was collector at Norfolk, and being collector at Norfolk he put this money, which was in his hands, into the State treasury of Virginia, to escape paying it over to a military officer under a military order, and the money is lying there now in the State treasury of Virginia. The last Congress passed a bill calling for that money and to suspend all suits against Simkins's sureties until the money was paid by the State of Virginia, and then to credit the sureties with the amount. That demand has been made by the Attorney-General, whose report accompanies this bill. The State of Virginia declines to pay it over, although they admit it is in the State treasury. It seemed just to the committee, while the money which the United States claims was put by Simkins, in order to protect it, in the only place which looked like a safe depository, his sureties now, under all the circumstances, should have this relief.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me, from the complicated character of this transaction, it should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman insists on his point of order, let it go there.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JONATHAN SEWELL.

Mr. PACKARD, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back adversely the petition of Jonathan Sewell, and the same was laid upon the table and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES M'DONNELL.

Mr. SCOFIELD also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1940) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by James McDonnell, a warrant officer in the Navy, of a present from the King of Italy; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, grants the consent of Congress to James McDonnell, a warrant officer in the Navy of the United States, to accept from the King of Italy a silver medal for assistance rendered on the 25th of June, 1873, in the port of Callao, Peru, to the Italian merchant vessel Delaide.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 632) to test a plan of storm and flood signals, &c., and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

ALBERT ROSS.

Mr. SCOFIELD. There is a matter which was before the Naval Committee, and which was omitted to be reported when that committee was called. It is in charge of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BURLEIGH.]

Mr. BURLEIGH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1942) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Albert Ross to the active list of the Navy; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the President of the United States to nominate, and by and with the advice of the Senate to appoint, Albert Ross to the active list of the Navy, with the rank of lieutenant; the name of said Ross to be placed on the list next below that of Edwin F. Jacobs; provided he shall not receive any extra pay for the time he was on the retired list.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] whether this bill reinstates the person named in it in the same rank he would have held if he had not been dismissed. Does it allow him to outrank those who have remained in the Navy?

Mr. BURLEIGH. It does. The disability was occasioned in the line of his duties, over which he had no control, and under a misapprehension of the examining commission.

Mr. SPEER. I misapprehended the bill. I thought he had been dismissed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURLEIGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Edwards on the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BETSIE LEWIS.

Mr. MELLISH, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1950) granting a pension to Betsie Lewis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ISAAC M. GRANT.

Mr. WALLACE, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1951) granting a pension to Isaac M. Grant; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NANCY C. MARLETTE.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1952) granting a pension to Nancy C. Marlette; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES J. DRUMWRIGHT.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the application of Charles J. Drumwright for a pension; and it was laid upon the table.

SUSAN W. MARTIN.

Mr. O'BRIEN, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the petition of Susan W. Martin; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM D. MORRISON.

Mr. O'BRIEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1953) granting a pension to William D. Morrison, late captain Company D, Seventh Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY B. RYDER.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 783) granting a pension to Henry B. Ryder; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN HENDERSON.

Mr. BURCHARD, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1954) for the relief of John Henderson, of New Orleans, Louisiana; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BURCHARD. I presume there will be no objection to that bill; there is a written report accompanying it, and I ask its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the gentleman reported it for reference to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is a proper bill for the Private Calendar, it should go there.

The SPEAKER. The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to refund and pay the amount of $5,000. It is clearly a matter for the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PASSAIC COUNTY NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. DURHAM, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 1899, authorizing the Passaic County National Bank to change its name.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that the name of the Passaic County National Bank, of Paterson, shall be changed to the Second National Bank, of Paterson, whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name, by resolution of the board, and cause a copy of such resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency; provided, that such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act; and that all expenses of such change, including that of printing and engraving, be paid by the said bank; and that all the debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the Passaic County National Bank, of Paterson, shall devolve upon and inure to the Second National Bank, of Paterson, whenever such change of name is effected.

Mr. DUNNELL. I raise the point of order that this is not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is a private bill; it requires unanimous consent to have it considered now.

Mr. DURHAM. I hope it may be considered now; it is a matter of importance to this bank.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLARD DAVIS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 751) for the relief of Willard Davis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

ALONZO SNYDER.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 261) for the relief of Alonzo Snyder, of Livingston County, New York; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

NELSON M'LAUGHLIN.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the same committee, also reported back the petition of Nelson McLaughlin, late captain Company M, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Calvary Volunteers; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Chenault, of Carthage, Missouri, for property alleged to have been taken by the Government; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour never expires, except by means of something of a higher privilege.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, also, reported back the memorial of George F. Brott, assignee of Brott, Davis & Shons; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

No. 1014) for the relief of Augustus Sprague, late a private of Company B, Second Michigan Volunteers; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

DAVID KLEIN.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the same committee, also reported back papers in the case of David Klein, for compensation for invention to enable armies to cross rivers; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for withdrawing from the files of the House the petition of H. C. Elliott, late lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and eighteenth Indiana Volunteers, praying for a pension, no adverse report on the case having been made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pending that motion, I move that debate in Committee of the Whole upon bills on the Private Calendar be limited to five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that motion except as to one particular bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, I ask unanimous consent that when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar debate on the various bills shall proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That seems hardly a fair rule to apply to every bill. It would be better to provide that we shall proceed under the five-minute rule after the expiration of ten minutes; in other words, that general debate upon each bill shall be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree to that; I ask that general debate upon each bill be limited to ten minutes, and the debate on amendments to five-minute speeches.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that after ten minutes allowed for general debate on each bill in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, the debate shall proceed under the five-minute rule.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. KASSON in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

WILLIAM SWANZEY.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 141) granting a pension to William Swanzey.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask that this bill be laid aside informally. An application for a pension in this case is pending before the Commissioner of Pensions, who, I trust, will act upon it favorably.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

HEIRS OF ASBURY DICKINS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1508) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the devisees of Asbury Dickins, deceased, the amount of $3,976.19; the same to be in full satisfaction of all claims for services by the said Asbury Dickins as acting Secretary of the Treasury, chief clerk of the Treasury, acting Secretary of State, and chief clerk in the State Department.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask that the report in this case be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that in all these cases the reports be read as a matter of course, without being called for.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 628) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins, deceased, beg leave to report:

That Asbury Dickins, while he was chief clerk of the Treasury Department, during the years 1829 to 1833, inclusive, and afterward while chief clerk of the State Department, at various times during the years 1833, 1835, and 1836, was several times appointed by the President, under the eighth section of the act of Congress of May 8, 1792, for short periods to act as Secretary of the Treasury and as Secretary of State. During these times he performed the duties of both Secretary and chief clerk, and only received the salary of one, and, with one exception, that was the salary of chief clerk. His duties during these times were very responsible and arduous. It was no part of his duty as chief clerk to act as Secretary; neither was there any incompatibility nor any law forbidding his doing so. In some such cases the officer has received both salaries; in others only one. Mr. Dickins first presented his claims in 1849, and the First Auditor of the Treasury, August 11, 1849, examined and adjusted the account, finding due from the United States to Asbury Dickins $3,976.19, but there was no appropriation out of which it could be paid.

The claim was presented to Congress February 20, 1854, and favorably reported and passed in the Senate February 23, 1854. It was favorably reported in the House, but getting on the Private Calendar it was defeated by a single objection. At the next session (second session Thirty-third Congress) it was referred to the Court of Claims. At the first session Thirty-fourth Congress the report of the Court of Claims showed a judgment for Mr. Dickins and a bill in his favor for the sum of $5,350.71. The opinion of the court, given at some length, shows clearly that the law was in his favor. The bill was carried back and forth between the two Houses, sometimes passed in one, sometimes in the other, till the last session of the Thirty-sixth Congress, when Mr. Dickins died. The state of the country obstructed further action. By Mr. Dickins's will the claim passed to his daughters Maria, Eloise and Amelia Dickins. In the Fortieth Congress it was revived, and has ever since been pending.

Chief Justice Taney, in the case of the United States vs. White, (district of Maryland,) and Justice Story, United States vs. Morse, (Story's Reports, volume 3, page 87,) gave decisions which justify in full the claim of the heirs of Mr. Dickins. As we have said, the Court of Claims, in Mr. Dickins's life-time, decided in his favor. And twenty-four years ago the Treasury Department stated the account, allowing him nearly $4,000.

With a view to a final adjustment of a claim that the committee regard as being entirely just and legal, they recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, giving the claimants the sum of $3,976.19, as a substitute for H. R. No. 628, herewith reported back.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. MELLISH. I do not know much about this bill; but——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] desire to oppose this bill?

Mr. MELLISH. I wish to state the objections to which it seems to me, judging from the report alone, the bill is liable.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does the gentleman oppose the bill because he does not know much about it?

Mr. MELLISH. What I do know about it is gathered entirely from the report; from reasons there appearing I oppose it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It seems to me a rather singular position for a gentleman to oppose a bill simply because he does not know anything about it.

Mr. MELLISH. I say I do not know anything about it except what appears in the report.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say for the information of the committee that this bill has been carefully considered, not only by a committee of the House at this session, but by various committees during previous Congresses.

The bill now before us was in the hands of a gentleman from New York, not to-day in his seat, and therefore I take charge of the bill in his absence.

I have in my hands a report made by the Committee on Claims of this House in 1860, presented by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] then a member of that committee. This report then made fully sustains the report made by the committee to-day.

I will say, for the further information of the committee, that the question was once referred to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims then awarded a larger amount; that is to say, they awarded two salaries as Secretary of State for a certain period, and as Secretary of the Treasury for a certain other period, at the same time allowing him pay as chief clerk of the State Department. That report was made by the Court of Claims to Congress, and was accompanied by a bill allowing this claimant something over $5,000. Congress did not concur with the Court of Claims, and therefore the claim was not paid. I am not aware, however, that any committee of either House at any time refused to report in favor of the amount now reported by the Committee on Claims; that is to say, to allow for one office, to allow him the pay of Secretary of State while he held the office of Secretary of State, and the salary of Secretary of the Treasury while he held the office of Secretary of the Treasury, giving him the compensation for the time he held the office fixed by law for that office; or, in other words, giving him the difference between the salary of chief clerk and the salary of Secretary of State or of Secretary of the Treasury while he held either of those offices.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, because I happen to know something about this whole case; and it is whether his attention has been called to its legislative history? If his attention has been called to it he can verify my statements. In the Thirty-third Congress a bill was passed in the Senate in favor of Mr. Dickins, which came over to this House and was referred to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims examined it and reported it back to the House with a recommendation in favor of its passage. It then went on the Private Calendar, but before it was acted on the Court of Claims was established, and that, with various others, was sent by order of the House to the Court of Claims, and the decision of the Court of Claims was in favor of Mr. Dickins.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That is substantially the fact, as I have examined the case. I will say further the amount allowed by the committee is the exact amount allowed by the Auditor of the Treasury Department when this account was originally audited, but was not paid because there was no money in the Treasury out of which it could be paid, or else it would have been paid years ago.

I move that the bill be reported back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MELLISH. I do not wish to say much about this bill. I do not know much about it except what is in the report. It is a claim over forty years old, and it seems to me that is prima facie about enough. It is the claim of the heirs of a man who held a lucrative position, I am told, nearly forty years under the Government, and who wants pay for two positions. I am opposed to the principle of any man holding two offices and drawing double salary, and if he chooses to accept two offices I am for insisting he shall receive pay for only one. One office is enough for one man.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. This is not such a claim. There is no pretense here that Congress is paying a man compensation for two offices at the same time, but only where he held two offices he shall receive compensation of the higher office during the time he held that office, deducting therefrom the amount received by him as chief clerk. The Court of Claims said he was entitled to compensation for the two offices, but in that decision Congress did not concur with the Court of Claims. Congress then only recommended the payment for one office, and that is all the pending bill proposes to do. We only provide for paying for one office.

Mr. MELLISH. He must have received what he was legally entitled to at the time, and it seems to me the Treasury of the United States is not so full that we can go back forty years and rake up old claims to pay men for holding two offices. I protest against it. Let us save what money we can. It is certainly a foolish way to spend it in raking up these claims forty years old to pay men for holding two offices. I know something about this office-holding and how the thing is done, and how these claims are gotten up. I am opposed to the whole thing. I hope we will keep our money in the Treasury and not throw it away.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to oppose this bill. There may be a serious question whether the law should allow any man holding one office and called to occupy another to recover the higher salary. That is, I think, now forbidden by law; but at the time this service was rendered it was not forbidden. This gentleman was called upon by the President of the United States, pursuant to a law then existing, while chief clerk of those Departments, at one time to act as Secretary of State and at another time to act as Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Dickins performed those duties. He performed them during the space of some months, and made claim for the salary provided by law for the higher office. There was no appropriation out of which this compensation could be paid, although the accounting officers of the Treasury Department decided he was entitled to it. He then came to Congress and presented his claim, which was referred to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims heard him and his proofs; they also heard the Government and its proofs, if it made any, and the Government solicitor, and finally rendered a decision in Mr. Dickins's favor and reported it to the Thirty-fourth Congress, allowing him, in addition to his salary as chief clerk, the amount of salary for the offices of the higher grade he had filled for the time he discharged the duties thereof.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. They allowed him for both?

Mr. POTTER. Yes; he was allowed by the court for both. Now the fact that this is an old claim, as suggested by my colleague, [Mr. MELLISH,] is not a reason why it should not be paid. On the contrary, a reason why, if just, it should be paid without more delay. Mr. Chairman, this whole business of determining private claims by Congress is a business which I could wish relegated to a tribunal which would determine the rights of claimants on notice to the Government according to law and justice; not ex parte, as we do, and not on such considerations as whether they be orphans or widows or old men, or whether their cases appeal to the sympathies of Congress or not. I cannot conceive any tribunal less fitted to do justice between claimants and the Government than Congress itself. My experience satisfies me—and I think the experience of every gentleman long in this House must accord with it—that Congress should provide a court for the determination of all private claims. A bill in the nature of a private claim is introduced into this House; it is sent to a committee, and is then referred to one member, who gives such attention to it as he deems fitting, subject to such influence and appeals to his sympathy as may be brought to bear on him by the claimant. The consideration given to it is wholly ex parte. If the gentleman is satisfied with the claim, he reports it back to the committee; and they usually on slight consideration allow him to report it to the House. Its fate in the House depends much on the skill and power of the gentleman who presents it; so that the House, carried away by sympathy or by some gentleman's eloquence or influence, often agrees to make payments which ought not, on principles of justice, to be made; and as often, perhaps, rejects claims really just, but which have not been as persistently or judiciously pressed, or which do not so warmly appeal to the sympathies of the House.

A citizen employed pursuant to law, and who renders a service to the Government—doing its work, saving its property—ought to be paid by the Government what is due for his service. On the other hand, as I contended last week in connection with a claim then before the House, one who voluntarily renders service, no matter how important, to private citizens, or in saving private property, even at a loss to himself, has no claim, however meritorious his action, on the Government. Government, as I think, should do justice, not grant favors. But, however that may be, here is the case of a man who rendered an authorized service to the Government. He preferred his claim; Congress referred it to its own court, and he had then an open trial. Witnesses were called on both sides; were heard; and counsel was heard, as well for the Government as for the claimant. And judgment was rendered in the claimant's favor twenty-odd years ago. Now, I say that it is a scandal and a disgrace that anybody, with a regular judgment thus fairly obtained against the Government in his favor, having thus established as absolute a right to his money as can be established in law, should be knocking twenty years afterward at the doors of Congress for payment of his dues—that is, for simple justice.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that this whole business of determining and paying for private claims upon the Government should be relegated from Congress, where it can never be disposed of as it ought to be, to some public court of justice, having the power to hear witnesses on both sides and to hear counsel on both sides, and then to render a judgment that can be enforced. And it is because this has been performed so far as the law then allowed in this case, and a judgment rendered entitling this man twenty years ago to this money, that I intend to vote in favor of this bill at this late period, as I should have done at any former time when I was in this House had this bill been then presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate on this bill, as limited by order of the House, has expired.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ESTATE OF JOHN T. WRIGHT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1581) for the relief of George S. Wright, administrator of the estate of John T. Wright, deceased.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George S. Wright, administrator of the estate of John T. Wright, deceased, the sum of $2,758.45, the amount of Treasury settlement numbered 536, dated March 13, 1869, in accordance with the certificates of the Third Auditor and the Second Comptroller.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George S. Wright, administrator of the estate of John T. Wright, deceased, asking compensation for transporting United States troops on the Pacific coast in the year 1865, having had the same under consideration, ask leave to report:

That the petition of said Wright, as above recited, was introduced into the House in the Forty-first Congress, on the 1st of April, 1869, and referred to the Committee on Claims, which, through its chairman, reported the same back to the House favorably, for $2,758.45, and with it submitted a report, which your committee, with some slight modification, adopt, and which is as follows, to wit:

On the 19th of June, 1855, John T. Wright contracted with Captain Robert Allen, assistant quartermaster at San Francisco, California, to transport a detachment of troops, one officer in charge of one hundred and thirty-six men, on the steamer America, from Benicia, California, to Steilacoom, Washington, at the rate of sixty-five dollars for each commissioned officer, and fifty dollars for each private and laundress, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $6,810; in pursuance of which the voyage was undertaken, with one commissioned officer, one hundred and thirty-two privates, and three laundresses on board.

When off Crescent City, three hundred and forty-eight miles on the route, the entire distance being eight hundred and forty-five miles, the steamer was burned to the water's edge, and the voyage interrupted.

It appears from evidence that the troops were fresh recruits from New York City, and, desirous of deserting to the California mines, they became mutinous, and arranged to break up the voyage by setting the ship on fire, which might enable them to escape to the shore and desert the service.

Captain Wright, the master of the vessel, returned immediately to San Francisco, and prepared and offered another vessel to complete the contract, which Captain Allen declined to accept. The contractor went forward, however, and victualed the steamer Goliah, proceeded to Crescent City, and tendered her to complete the contract. The officer in command of the detachment declined to ship on the Goliah, by reason of instructions from Captain Allen that he would furnish transportation. Shortly afterward the steamer Active, doing duty in the United States Coast Survey, came into Crescent City and offered to take the troops on board, which the officer accepted, and all that had not deserted were thus transported to their destination.

In the mean time Captain Allen had chartered a sailing vessel, which did no service, but was paid. The contractor, John T. Wright, claimed the full contract price, and from time to time prosecuted his claim before the accounting officers of the Treasury without success. He declined to accept pro rata pay for the actual service performed, and never submitted evidence of that character. He died at last, and the claim rested. After his death, his administrator and the heirs of his estate submitted new and additional evidence, and procured a rehearing. On the 12th of March, 1869, there was awarded to the estate pro rata pay for the service of the steamer America, and Treasury settlement No. 536, for $2,758.45, was signed and transmitted by the Third Auditor, and admitted and certified by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury. This action of the proper accounting officers, it would be supposed, was sufficient to establish the claim. But the then Secretary of War, under the advice of the Quartermaster-General, objected to its payment without a special appropriation by Congress, on the grounds that the service was rendered fourteen years ago; that the claim had been rejected and reopened after the lapse of that time; that current appropriations ought not to be diverted to the payment of past service, and particularly the invitation of this precedent to clamorous agents and heirs to untie the dusty files of the Treasury for the old balances buried there.

The letter of the Secretary of War, while it transmits an argument adverse to the claim, is, in fact, but an estimate for an appropriation, proper under existing laws.

The act of March 30, 1868, provides "that the proper head of the proper Department, before signing a warrant for any balance certified to him by a Comptroller, may submit to such Comptroller any facts in his judgment affecting the correctness of such balance; but the decision of the Comptroller thereon shall be final and conclusive."

There would seem, then, to be little need of additional legislation for the settlement of this claim.

The Second Comptroller has reported at length upon it, and his decision by law is "final and conclusive."

No new facts are submitted by the War Department affecting its correctness. The inconsiderable amount could not seriously disturb the current appropriations of the War Department. The bad policy of paying an old claim is offered as the principal objection. This might be an argument for a new statute of limitations, but that subject is not now under consideration; until such a statute is passed, applicable to this class of claims, the Government must depend, as hitherto, upon the integrity and capacity of its accounting officers. The committee have very critically examined the Comptroller's report and various other opinions bearing on the questions involved in the claim. They agree with his conclusions, and are satisfied that he performed his duty in adjudicating this claim conscientiously and correctly; and it is their opinion that the claimant ought to have been paid without delay the amount found due him in Treasury settlement No. 536, dated March 13, 1869.

Concurring, as your committee do, in the views set forth in the foregoing report, they also concur in its conclusions, and accordingly report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should be very glad to hear the letter of the Secretary of War read, if it be among the papers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that it is not among the papers.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amount, I believe, is $2,750. It would have been very desirable to have had here the views presented by the Secretary of War to the committee; but as the Secretary's letter is not here I suppose we must take the report adopted by the committee with that letter before them.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably.

C. C. SPAIDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1582) for the relief of C. C. Spaids.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to C. C. Spaids the sum of $633, it being pay for his services as second lieutenant of Company A, Fourth Illinois Cavalry Regiment.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 721) for the relief of C. C. Spaids, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Company A, Fourth Illinois Cavalry; was promoted to first sergeant; and, June 3, 1863, was commissioned, by the governor of the State of Illinois, second lieutenant of same company, but was refused a muster, because it was below the minimum. He served, however, as second lieutenant, performing all the duties, incurring the dangers, and bearing the responsibilities. For a long time he commanded the company, in the field, on the march, and in several engagements; was wounded several times, and finally discharged for disability the 6th day of February, 1864, making his term of service as lieutenant eight months. The case of Alexander W. Henry vs. The United States, (Court of Claims, volume 6, page 162,) in its facts, as stated by the court, was identical with this. Your committee concur with the court, in their conclusions of fact and law, and recommend the payment to this claimant of $633, the difference between the pay of first sergeant, which he received, and the pay of second lieutenant, which was refused him for the reasons above set forth; and, to that end, recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

CHARLES J. M'KINNEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1583) for the relief of Charles J. McKinney, of Tennessee.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Charles J. McKinney, of Hawkins County, Tennessee, $100 for quartermaster stores furnished the United States Army.

The Clerk then read the report, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred Executive Document 115, third session Forty-second Congress, covering letter from the Secretary of War in relation to the claim of Charles J. McKinney, of Tennessee, having examined the same, report:

That the said Charles J. McKinney furnished $100 worth of leather for use of the third brigade, fourth division, Twenty-third Army Corps, which was duly receipted for by the brigade commander; that the said leather was used during the month of November by said brigade, but it does not appear whether the leather was used by the Quartermaster's or the Ordnance Department, but it is clear from the evidence that the leather was used by one of the two departments.

Wherefore your committee are of opinion that the claimant is entitled to the relief asked for; and for that purpose report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF SETH LAMB.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1585) for the relief of the heirs of Seth Lamb.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Theodore L. Lamb, Mary M. Muldan, and Philena Kingsley, the sum of $490, being in full of the claim of Seth Lamb, deceased, for boarding and quartering Captain Mott's Howitzer Corps, Second Regiment New York State Militia, from the 21st of May to the 1st of June, 1861.

The Clerk then read the report, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 1585, beg leave to report:

That claimants' father, Seth Lamb, at the time of the breaking out of hostilities between the Confederate States and the United States, was the proprietor of the Saint Charles Hotel, city of Washington, and that from May 21, 1861, to June 1, 1861, he boarded and quartered Captain Mott's Howitzer Corps, Second Regiment New York State Militia, and that said corps were in the service of the United States, and that no other quarters or rations had been provided for them, and that owing to the loss of the voucher the Government did not pay the same. They represent that the charges are very moderate, being only 33½ cents per meal for each officer and soldier. The evidence is conclusive in the case, and proves clearly the liability of the Government. Therefore your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee rose informally to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 1761) granting swamp lands in Holt County, Missouri, to said Holt County, for school purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 437) to restore William Kilburn, of San Francisco, California, to the Navy of the United States as an ensign.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the Private Calendar.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS IN OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1586) to provide for ascertaining losses sustained by citizens of Southern Oregon and Northern California by reason of Indian depredations in 1872 and 1873.

The bill was read.

The first section authorizes and empowers the President of the United States to appoint three persons to act as commissioners to inquire into the extent and character of the depredations committed in Southern Oregon and Northern California, in the years 1872 and 1873, during the period of what is known as the Modoc war; by what tribe or bands of Indians committed, and the number and names of persons murdered, and the number and names of the survivors of the families of such persons; the character and value of the property destroyed or carried away, and to whom the same belonged; and the damage sustained by citizens by reason of such depredations, rendered upon itemized bills.

The second section provides that it shall be the duty of said commissioners, or a majority of them, as soon as practicable, to proceed to the scene of said depredations, and take testimony under oath, of such witnesses as may appear before them, of all such depredations; when, where, and by what tribes or bands, and upon and against whom committed, and as to the value of the property destroyed or taken away, and the damage sustained by each citizen by reason of such depredations; and shall make up and transmit to the Secretary of the Interior, as soon as practicable, their report, showing the result of such investigation, to which shall be appended the testimony taken by them; provided that said commissioners, before proceeding to hear such testimony, shall give notice of the time and place of their meeting by publication thereof, at least ten days previously, in the two newspapers published nearest the scene of said depredations; provided further that said commissioners shall, before entering upon their duties, each take an oath to faithfully perform the duties of his office.

The third section provides that said commissioners shall be entitled to, and shall receive, as compensation for their services, the sum of ten dollars per day each, together with their traveling and other necessary expenses; and each of said commissioners is authorized and empowered to administer oaths, and also to order before them such witnesses as they may deem important.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no report accompanying this bill.

Mr. AVERILL. There should be a report accompanying the bill, but by some inadvertence it has got mislaid. I will only say to the committee that the bill had a full and fair consideration by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was reported by that committee by a unanimous vote. I will say, further, that while it may be considered an innovation to appoint a commission for the examination of accounts of this character, yet it is no innovation. There are precedents for it, and the nearest one I can think of was in the case of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, the State of Minnesota, and although the magnitude of the damages claimed for ravages in this case is far inferior to what it was in that, the cases are of the same character. The question for the Committee on Indian Affairs first to determine was whether these claims might be meritorious. To determine that fact was a work which was considered would impose too great a task on the committee and would put the claimants to too much trouble to ask them to do it at that time. This was claimed by those who presented the bill and advocated it. The committee concluded that inasmuch as all these damages were consequent upon what is called the Modoc war, and were caused by troops used there to subdue the Indians, and remove them from the reservation, it was right and proper and just, as in the case of Minnesota, that a commission should be formed to investigate the matter.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have been waiting for the gentleman to come to a period, to inquire whether this is a private bill. It seems to me that it is a public bill to establish a tribunal.

Mr. AVERILL. I do not know anything more private than money that might be awarded by the tribunal to private individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark that that question was determined by the House in referring the bill to this committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I raise the question because I do not wish a bad precedent to creep in.

Mr. AVERILL. What does the gentleman refer to—the precedent before the committee, or the precedent of this bill?

Mr. SPEER. Can this point be raised here at all?

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot. The order of the House placing the bill on the Calendar brings it before the committee for action.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have not risen for the purpose of antagonizing the bill, but for the purpose, at the first time when the matter has been brought to my attention, of protesting against a bill of this character being treated or regarded as a private bill. It is certainly a public bill establishing a tribunal for the consideration of the claims of all citizens who may come within the provision and purview of it.

Mr. KELLOGG. The gentleman should have made his point in the House, and not here.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should have made it in the House had my attention been called to it.

Mr. AVERILL. That was a matter to be determined at the time the bill was reported and referred.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was about to remark that this is the first time that the matter has come to my attention, or I should have made the objection before the bill was referred to the committee. I am aware of the attitude it occupies here; and I have merely risen to call the attention of the committee to what appears to me to have been an oversight in giving the bill this direction.

Mr. AVERILL. It is the gentleman's fault if his attention was not called to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Minnesota is through I desire a word only.

Mr. AVERILL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, I will wait until the gentleman is through.

Mr. AVERILL. I now yield to the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH,] who lives in the immediate vicinity where these occurrences took place.

Mr. NESMITH. Inasmuch as there is no report accompanying this bill, I desire to submit a letter for the consideration of the committee, written by a gentleman who acted for a short time with the peace commissioners—a letter from Mr. Jesse Applegate, of Oregon; and I desire to say that no more honorable man lives in that State, or perhaps in any other State. He is a frontiersman, who has lived there for a third of a century, and I have been intimate with him in almost all the relations of life. I desire that his letter upon this subject be read to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

LINKVILLE, JACKSON COUNTY, OREGON,
November 4, 1873.

DEAR SIR: Being within the lines of the belligerents in the late unpleasantness between the United States of America and a part of the Modoc Indians, and for a short time officially connected with the commission to make peace between these powers, it seems to be a duty I owe to justice and the sufferers in that war to state to you, and through you to all others who wish to know them, the facts upon which the citizens claim indemnity for the losses sustained during the continuance of hostilities.

Though the Indian title was not extinguished until later, the public surveys were extended over the country bordering Lost River and the north or Oregon end of Tule or Rhett Lake by Thomson and Fisher, deputies of Surveyor-General Chapman, in 1859, and the country open for settlement since that date. Superintendent Huntington, joined with two others in a commission, purchased the right of the Modocs to the country and removed them out of it three or four years after. The State of Oregon located a part of its land grants in Lost River Valley; so, you perceive, the country had been for many years before the breaking out of the Modoc war as legitimately open to a white settlement as any other part of the State.

A part of the Modoc tribe, under the lead of Captain Jack, a sub-chief, rebelled against his principal and the United States authorities, left the reservation, refused to return to it, and persistently remained in their old haunts. A wild, lawless people, in rebellion against all legitimate authority, could not long roam at will in a settled country and gain their living in it without committing depredations upon the white inhabitants. Of these depredations frequent complaints were made to the authorities, but with a prudence and forbearance which is without precedent the settlers refrained from avenging their own wrongs. I can myself bear witness, as member of the peace commission, that among the wrongs and grievances complained of by the Indians in excuse of their contumacy they charged none of them to the settlers—always expressing a willingness to live among them.

When at last the Government determined to remove these Indians from the settlements by force, this purpose, as well as the movement of troops necessary to carry it into effect, was carefully concealed from the settlers most exposed to Indian revenge in case of failure.

The massacre of the defenseless settlers on the 29th and 30th of November, 1872, would not have taken place but for this military precaution, which left them unwarned and unprepared to take care of their own safety; nor would there have been that reckless waste and destruction of private property that continued from that date until June, 1873, had there been adequate military protection.

While the peace commission was exerting its futile efforts to procure the submission of the Indians, on one occasion the delegates from the Indian camp came into ours riding upon the horses and wearing the clothes of a despoiled settler who happened to be present; and when General Canby was advised of this fact, the settler was forbidden to take any steps to recover his property or even lay claim to it, lest it would damage the peace negotiations, and the settler was assured that if he would bear his wrongs patiently the Government would fully reimburse him and all others for the losses sustained by the war.

Some of the facts concerning the murders and robberies committed upon the settlers were placed upon the records of the peace commission, and may there be found in authentic form—that is, if the Government retains among its archives such an evidence of its own folly.

Having written more than I intended, I will briefly add that during the whole war fifteen soldiers only were detailed to guard the lives of citizens, and they only for the short period from the commencement until the 17th of January fight. At no time was there any military protection given to property, nor were the troops at any time prior to the investment of Jack's stronghold, in April, so placed as to prevent the Indians raiding over a large portion of the country, covered with the stock of the settlers, with impunity.

In view of these facts I believe if ever a Government owed a debt to its citizens for want of protection, that debt is due from ours to the sufferers from the Modoc war.

If the Government is disposed to do something for these people, ruined by its neglect, in Heaven's name prevent, if you can, swindlers and thieves from using their just claims as a key to unlock the Treasury only for their own benefit.

Let a commission of honest men be sent upon the ground to ascertain the actual losses, and report them to Congress. With the facts properly before it Congress may provide for the payment of all that is due to the sufferers—nothing to middle-men.

To show you I still have some faith in men's honesty, I will name Judge Roseborough, of California, Judge Primm, of Oregon, and General Frank Wheaton, of the Army. I name the judges because the war was carried on in their judicial districts, and the general because he now commands this military district and for long the troops in the field. By holding a session at the nearest point to the scene of hostilities where claimants and witnesses could most easily reach them, these gentlemen could in a few days ascertain for the use of Congress the amount due to settlers, from the correctness of which neither Government nor settlers would appeal.

Sincerly, your friend,

JESSE APPLEGATE.

Hon. J. W. NESMITH, M. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The ten minutes allowed for general debate has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to move to amend this bill by striking out of the first section the words "appoint three persons to act as commissioners," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "detail an officer of the Army of the United States on the Pacific coast." And I move further to amend the bill to make it correspond to that amendment, changing the word "commissioners," where it occurs, to the word "officers," &c.

As members of this Committee of the Whole will recollect, the attention of the General of the Army was directed a few years ago to investigating the depredations and the expenses incurred by the Government growing out of Indian hostilities in Montana. In that case the most intelligent report, the one that received the most entire sanction of the House, was made. This bill provides for the appointment of three commissioners, who are each to receive ten dollars a day and their mileage and traveling expenses. If appointed from the Atlantic coast, they must proceed to the Pacific coast, and there travel two or three thousand miles for the purpose of taking testimony. I am assured by gentlemen familiar with the subject that it will not require more than two weeks of time to perform this service. The field over which these depredations were committed is comparatively small. There seems to be no reason why we should create this commission, which cannot fail to be a source of great expense to the Government under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. AVERILL. Does the gentleman contemplate two officers of the Army and one civil officer?

Mr. HOLMAN. My amendment proposes that there shall be detailed a single officer of the Army; for it struck me that one officer was sufficient.

Mr. AVERILL. It is placing too much power in one man.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I will modify my amendment so as to require that three officers of the Army shall be detailed by the President for this purpose. We all know that at this time there are many officers of the Army on the Pacific coast who are comparatively unemployed. This investigation can be carried on by them with little or no expense to the Government. Then why should we authorize a board, as proposed by this bill, which must be very expensive?

Mr. NESMITH. Let me say in reply to what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has said, that there will be no necessity for selecting citizens on this side and sending them to the Pacific coast. We have intelligent citizens there who can perform this service, and it will not take them more than two weeks to examine into this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] informs the committee that it will not take more than two weeks to perform this duty. I hope he will go a step further and inform us whether, according to his experience, there is not a number of exceedingly competent military officers on the Pacific coast to-day, who can be detailed for this duty.

Mr. NESMITH. If the gentleman will modify his amendment so as to make it two Army officers and one citizen, I will not object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see any reason for that. I have called the attention of the committee to the fact that the report in the Montana case, from the Inspector-General of the Army, was the most intelligent report we have ever had on such a subject. The objection to the other plan is this: if these three commissioners are selected from the Pacific coast there will be a leaning one way; if selected from the Atlantic coast there may be a leaning the other way. The Army officers would be impartial, and it seems to me that these are the very services which Army officers are fitted to perform.

Mr. MAYNARD. Permit me to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to an amendment which has suggested itself to my mind. It was to detail three officers of the Army, one from the Inspector-General's office.

Mr. HOLMAN. There may not be any such officer on the Pacific coast. All that I desire is that these officers shall be taken from the Pacific coast, so that this matter may not be attended with too much expense.

Mr. AVERILL. I will not object to the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I take it for granted that in making this detail the President will take into account all the facts which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] seems to regard of importance.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The amendment already agreed to renders necessary two or three other amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. The provision as to pay will, of course, have to be struck out.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. And the word "commissioners" should be struck out wherever it occurs and the word "officers" substituted.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desires to test the principle of the proposed amendment he can do it on this motion, and afterward have the necessary corrections made in the bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understood that the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; the question has not yet been put.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for a vote upon my amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "appoint three persons to act as commissioners," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "detail three officers of the Army of the United States serving on the Pacific coast."

Strike out the word "commissioners" wherever it occurs and insert "officers."

Strike out also these words: "that said commissioners shall be entitled to, and shall receive as compensation for their services the sum of ten dollars per day each, together with their traveling and other necessary expenses."

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken on the amendment to the first section.

Mr. SHANKS. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposing to intrust this matter to the hands of Army officers. I will state my objection to this proposition. There were but fifty-three Indians engaged in that war, if you call it a war; and I am not entirely satisfied that the Army officers should determine this matter because it might involve a determination of the provocation for what they call a "war." I much prefer that this question should come before men who were not connected with this matter, men whose heads are cool, who have no aspersions to make, who have not been driven back by fifty-three helpless men, who have not quailed before fifty-three men for seven long months. I desire that cool, candid men, with feelings unbiased, shall go there and determine this question, because it may involve very largely the great question of settling the Indian troubles at this time. I undertake to say upon this floor that there was provocation for the action of those Indians. I do not mean to say that there was any justification for the murder of our citizens; there can be no justification for that; but there was much to provoke them to hostility. I want this question determined by men who had no part in managing that matter, who had no part in the excitement which the death of General Canby produced, who had no part in compelling those Indians to submit to a powerful force; men who would not feel themselves called upon to vindicate their standing as Army officers. I want men to go there who have no past records to take care of, who will have nothing to do but to settle the single question as to losses of property which have been suffered by these persons.

Mr. RICE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he does not believe that the officers of our Army can be trusted?

Mr. SHANKS. Yes, sir; the officers of the Army can be trusted to perform their appropriate duties. In battle I would trust them; but I am not willing to trust them in a matter of this kind, which I wish to have decided by men who have had no connection with the transactions in question—who will go there with unbiased minds and settle the matter without any prejudice or prepossession.

Mr. NESMITH. I move to amend the amendment so as to provide that this commission shall consist of one citizen with two Army officers. Upon this amendment I desire to be heard.

I am sorry that my friend from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] has raised the question as to the causes which brought on the Modoc war, and the provocation there may have been on either side. Time will not permit me to go fully into the discussion of that question; but in vindication of the Army I wish to say to him and to this House that the Army were not held back. The Army, sir, was not held back for the period of time which the gentleman mentions, six or seven months, by the prowess of those hostile Indians. They were held there by that infamous system which had its beginning here in Washington. It is a system which has been well called the "pow-wow policy." It is born of the sickly sentimentality of the Cooper novel. Under its pestiferous influence commissioners went out to arrest the movements of the troops and prevent their going into the lava beds to fight the Indians. Without undertaking to discuss the question of provocation, (because time will not permit me,) I say that those gallant troops, with arms in their hands, and ready to fight on all occasions, were restrained by orders from Washington. Talk about their quailing in the presence of the Modoc Indians! Sir, the gallant men who fell in defense of the rights of the people murdered upon the frontier, leaving their blood upon that soil, made a record which will vindicate them and the Army against all aspersion.

I desire to say that that war was not brought on by any acts upon the part of our citizens or settlers. I have the reports now before me to show that the contest was brought on by unprovoked attack. Without provocation the Indians began the fight upon the defenseless people among whom they had been living, and who, as is stated in the letter of Mr. Applegate, (than whom a more honorable gentleman does not live in that State, or any other,) had "treated the Indians with the utmost forbearance." Not a drop of Indian or of white blood had been shed there for many years. These Indians were off their reservation; and it was the duty of the Government to force them back. It was the duty of the Government to compel them to remain there. Suppose that a band of murderous Indians should go to the district of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS.] Suppose they should commence destroying his property and that of his neighbors; and that the Government should refuse to place those Indians back upon their reservation, as they were bound to do for the protection of the imperiled people. Suppose, sir, that when an army was sent there to defend the citizens, the authorities at Washington should interpose, and prevent the army from driving the Indains back to their reservation, and thus hold the army paralyzed and powerless to do anything, would that be a just cause for reflection upon the Army? I say the gallantry of those men who shed their blood in that miserable desert, that most terrible place, known as the lava beds, is sufficient vindication. It is sufficient vindication of the Army and of those volunteers of Northern California and Southern Oregon that they took a large part in these perilous and bloody transactions. Is there any human mode for the vindication of heroism higher than that which yields its life-blood in a just cause?

No man or set of men—not even the peace commissioners—dared to insinuate for one moment that this war was brought on by any reckless or culpable conduct on the part of the white settlers. On the contrary, the settlers had treated the Indians with great forbearance. After the murders had been perpetrated of eighteen people, the court of Jackson County, Oregon, the highest judicial tribunal known to our State, indicted these Modocs for murder, and sent the sheriff to arrest them. The military authorities, under instructions emanating from Washington, ordered them to refuse to surrender the murderers. When Judge Prim issued a writ of habeas corpus to bring them before him, the writ was disregarded, the rights of the State were disregarded, and these murderers were marched out of our State in defiance of law, in defiance of right, and in defiance of justice, all red and bloody handed as they were.

Mr. SHANKS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to know from the gentleman from Oregon who marched out of that State red-handed with the blood of five murdered prisoners of war. Let him tell me who murdered five prisoners of war in his State and marched out red-handed and bloody-handed from the murder of defenseless prisoners of war.

Mr. NESMITH. Who murdered your General Canby and Dr. Thomas under a flag of truce? Was it the white settlers?

Mr. SHANKS. That brings me to what I want to say.

Mr. NESMITH. It is not known who murdered the five Indians, but it is known who murdered Canby and Thomas under a flag of truce.

Mr. SPEER rose.

Mr. SHANKS. I have the floor, I believe, and I want to go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. SHANKS. I thought his time was up; I did not wish to interrupt him, but supposed I had the floor in my own right.

Mr. NESMITH. I wish to say this in reference to the question of the gentleman from Indiana, as to who murdered prisoners of war—that it is not known by whom it was done. I dare say it was done by some exasperated people in that country. I dare say it was done by those who had witnessed these Indian devastations; who had seen their murdered and scalped fathers and brethren lying round their desolated hearths. I dare say it was some of those.

Mr. Chairman, I say now to the gentleman from Indiana, if I had been there, and that hellish fate had been visited upon my family, I would have been one of the men who would have struck for my rights and the rights of my people.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SHANKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Oregon, since he has made the remark he has, whether he would have been one of the men who would have murdered prisoners of war? Let him answer the question which I now put to him. I wait for a reply.

Mr. NESMITH. Retaliation is a law of our nature. Supposing some Indian should raise the ambrosial locks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] [great laughter,] to ornament a lodge-pole, and his father, brother, or son should seek revenge, who would complain?

Mr. SHANKS. I have the floor. I wish to say to the House, and I wish it to remember, that some years ago there was an officer by the name of Wright——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, there is so much confusion in the House, I hope it will be called to order.

Mr. SHANKS. The committee is now in order, and I will proceed. Mr. Chairman, we have heard of wrongs being done to white settlers which I deplore as much as any other man can; but I wish to call the attention of this House and the country to a provocation as terrible as ever struck the heart of mortal man. Some years ago, I believe in 1847, but I will not be particular as to the date, this Captain Jack, who has become a character of national notoriety, if not of national fame, had a father, who, though he may have been an Indian, was as near perhaps to Jack as the father of the gentleman from Oregon is to him or mine is to me. Wright and his citizens had some difficulty with the Indians. The provocation was charged to be murders committed by the Indians prior to that time, which murders by the Indians were charged upon the whites.

Be that as it may, I will now come to the statement I desire to make. This man Wright—I believe they called him Ben Wright—had charge of some troops there, improvised for the occasion, perhaps. Wright invited Jack's father, who was then chief of the Modocs, to come to his camp, which he did, and brought with him forty of the leading men of his tribe. This man Wright, after inviting Jack's father, the chief of the tribe, and the other Indians, under a flag of truce, there in his own camp laid a plan to poison the men whom he had invited there. He decided to poison the beef which he invited them to his table to eat—poison it with strychnine—that he might kill the men whom he invited to his camp under a flag of truce. But it reached the ears of the Indians that it was not safe to eat Wright's beef, and consequently they did not eat it. And then what did he do? Those gentlemen whom the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] eulogizes so much, what did they do? Why, sir, under that flag of truce, they shot down the chief of the tribe and forty of its members.

Jack himself was there, being then a child, and saw the murder of his father and the sacrifice of his people under that flag of truce. Recognizing the atrocity of the crime that was committed on his father and his tribe, from that hour he was not the friend of the white man. Nor could he be until the hour he went home to answer in the other country for the answer he gave for that crime by the brave arm he uplifted against the murderers of his parents.

Mr. NESMITH. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. SHANKS. Just one word more, and then I will. Mr. Meacham, who was present at the murder of Canby, and was himself wounded, told me himself, with his own lips, that when Captain Jack murdered Canby, from the spot where he stood when he committed that deed, he could view the spot where his father and forty of his people fell, murdered under the flag of truce by the gentlemen extolled by the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH.]

Mr. NESMITH. I desire just three or four minutes more.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. NESMITH. Suppose the gentleman from Indiana has recited the facts of history correctly, then I consent to his pedigree of Jack's paternal ancestry. May I not remark in such a connection, that among Indians pedigree is a very uncertain matter? But setting that aside, and allowing the gentleman to give his own version of the Jack genealogical tree, I want to say this: that my friend has been imposed upon with reference to Ben Wright. I knew him well. He was my fellow-soldier. We had marched together in long, weary campaigns in the Cayuse war. We had slept under the same blanket. We had fought the Indians together. We had eaten from the carcasses of the same dead horses. I knew him well. I will say that a more brave and gallant man and soldier never lived. But he had suffered at the hands of these savages. He wanted, nay he sought, retaliation.

Now, so far as this matter is concerned about the flag of truce and the butchery on Lost River, I think I can present to the gentleman some facts which will relieve his mind in regard to the outrages which he supposes were perpetrated on that occasion. For long years those Modoc Indians at Lost River had been constantly butchering the emigrants. Weary men, women, and children were winding their way across that desert of a thousand miles, and on reaching that neighborhood, which they had hailed as an oasis in the desert where they could obtain rest and water and grass for their stock, they had been murdered by hundreds. This had occurred only a few days before this fight. It was not a massacre, but a fair fight. It was a fair fight between Ben Wright and his men and those people at Lost River. The gentleman from Indiana characterizes it as a butchery under a flag of truce. There was no flag of truce. Ben Wright with not over forty or fifty men—and some of them are in this city today——

Mr. LUTTRELL. There were but fifteen all told.

Mr. NESMITH. My friend from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] who resides in that neighborhood, tells me that Wright had but fifteen men all told. I was in Oregon at the time. It was about three hundred miles from the scene. Volunteers were sent out. They buried those men, women, and children, who had been murdered in the most barbarous manner, including, perhaps, some of the constituents of the gentleman from Indiana. Ben Wright and his men gathered up their remains and buried them with decency and care. Ben Wright went there as well for that purpose as for the purpose of protecting a little remnant of the emigrants still behind, who, without that protection, would have shared the same sad fate. While he was there Jack's tribe desired to hold a consultation with him, and assembled for that purpose on Lost River. Wright had with him fifteen men, and with that force met the Modoc tribe. It included as many of the warriors as could be assembled on that occasion. Ben Wright had positive information that these persons intended to betray him in that council, that they intended to murder him and his party; and, sir, they were numerous enough to do it. He had that same positive information which Canby, and Meacham, and Dr. Thomas had, that they would be murdered. Ben Wright and his party took time by the forelock. When fight was inevitable they commenced to fight first; and it was a fair fight in which these savages were killed. They had assembled there for the purpose of acting treacherously and murdering Ben Wright and his party, as they had murdered whole trains of emigrants before. Going into the camps of these helpless, travel-worn people, under the guise of friendship, and pretending to extend aid and assistance to them, they butchered them in the most merciless manner. They perpetrated other crimes, too shocking, sir, for me to describe in a decent and civilized assemblage. I happen to know more about this matter than the gentleman from Indiana. I am not a great warrior like him, and did not pour out my water like blood in the last war. [Great laughter.] But I have been on the frontier nearly all my life, and I have witnessed these infernal butcheries. I have buried the remains of men, women, and children who have fallen in these treacherous conflicts, sir.

If the gentleman desires to place the blame with the frontiersmen, I ask, in God's name, what interest have the people on the frontier, poor men with wives and children, and their household gods, in the neighborhood of strange, savage, and warlike tribes of Indians, to incite hostility?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been more than exhausted. The Chair has allowed the debate to proceed five minutes beyond the time allowed by the rule, waiting for action by the committee. The question before the committee is on the amendment to the amendment; that being disposed of, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS.]

[Cries of "Let him go on now."]

Mr. LUTTRELL. I would like the indulgence of the House for two minutes only on this proposition.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not wish to enforce the rules rigidly, and he will now first recognize the gentleman from Indiana, and then the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to say that I do not antagonize this bill.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I rise to a point of order. If these gentlemen are merely carrying on a conversation between themselves it may be well enough that they should do it in the prevailing disorder, but if we are to hear what is said we cannot do it with gentlemen standing all around us and making so much noise.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. Gentlemen must resume their seats, and the gentleman from Indiana has the floor, not by order of the Chair, but by the consent of the committee.

Mr. SHANKS. I did not rise for the purpose of antagonizing this bill; I only rose for the purpose of doing that which it sometimes becomes necessary to do, to say a few words for a people who do not seem to have quite as many friends in this country as I think they ought to have. That was my purpose in what I did say; but the gentleman from Oregon says that I am mistaken in my history of this matter. I ask you, sir, what different history he gave of the matter from that which I did? He confessed judgment; and he told this House that he had eaten mule-meat and one thing and another in company with Ben Wright, and offered that as a vindication, I suppose, for that was the strength of his argument, for the murders which Wright committed. He said another thing: he said that Wright had reason to believe that he would be attacked. I ask him what reason he had for so believing, when he was directing the murder of these men who were then at his camp? He was not at the Indians' camp; they were at his camp. What information of an expected attack had he when he was paving the way to poison the men who were to be guests at his table? For God's sake, if it is a fact that he was in danger of being destroyed by this people, why in Heaven's name was he feeding them with beef at his camp? If these Indians, or savages, if you please to call them so, were there to his knowledge for the purpose of murdering him and his men, why did he prepare a feast for them? When you spread a feast for your friends and neighbors, you do not assume in spreading it that you are spreading it for murderers.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman will allow me a moment. I cannot sit here and listen to such assertions without denying them. Will the gentleman tell me by what authority he states that Ben Wright attempted to poison these Indians? Sir, I deny it in toto.

Mr. SHANKS. I am answering one man now; I will answer the other afterward. I am ready to answer as many as come against me. I ask the question again: Do you spread a feast for those who you know are gathered to murder you, or do men spread feasts for those who they know are gathered to murder them? Do they spread such a feast when they have been notified that murderers are in their households? No, sir; it was a deception by Ben Wright. He and his men had determined first to poison these Indians; but they were notified beforehand by some friendly Indians that the meat was poisoned and would not eat it, and then they were shot down by Ben Wright's order.

But there is another feature in this case. There was another provocation. After that time a treaty was made by the United States with the Modoc Indians. They were told that they should have a certain place in which they could rest for the balance of their days. But that treaty was not confirmed, and they were driven from their place, and they were told that they should go out on some island in the Pacific Ocean, and when thus told, some fifty-three of them braved the national Government and fought it.

But I want to say another thing. It is charged here by the gentleman from Oregon that the peace policy was the cause of all these troubles. Sir, the Secretary of the Interior directed the peace commissioners to obey the orders of General Canby. The only order that went from the Secretary of the Interior to them—I saw it the other day—ordered them to pay implicit obedience to General Canby. And General Canby was with them with his own power as military commander. The peace commissioners had positive written instructions from the Secretary of the Interior that they were not in any way to interfere with General Canby or his orders. That letter of the Secretary of the Interior is now being printed for the information of this House, and as soon as it reaches here from the printing office, the statement which has been made will receive condemnation from the letter itself. There was no direction to have the peace officers act above the military, but a positive order from the Secretary of the Interior that they should submit to the military.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement of the gentleman that Ben Wright had attempted to poison these Modocs, I deny it in toto. I have resided in California since I was fourteen years of age; I know no other country. I have resided in the vicinity of these lava beds for seventeen or eighteen years. I knew Ben Wright, and have known him well. A braver or more honorable man never breathed the breath of life. I deny that he attempted to poison the Indians. It is a story got up by those who go out, not to teach the Indians or to instruct them but to rob them. It is a story got up by these people, to poison the minds of the people of the Eastern States against the frontiersmen.

I tell you that Ben Wright was innocent. I was in those lava beds last year. I went there with some of Ben Wright's men, with several of his followers who were present and participated in that fight or massacre, as the gentleman terms it. I was on the ground where occurred this so-called massacre. These men there said to me, in the presence of others, that not a word of this story was true. They are men who are the best citizens of my country, as good men as any in any other part of the world, and they deny this story in toto, as a base calumny on the name of a brave man.

I will tell you, sir, what kind of a massacre that was. There was no beef purchased; there was no beef issued to the Indians; there was no arsenic or strychnine or other poison purchased. I defy the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] to produce any proof that such was the case. On the contrary, I am prepared to produce proof that not one word of that story is true. There were twenty-seven emigrants—men, women and children—traveling through that country in Siskiyou County. They were emigrants from Indiana, Illinois, and other Western States. And when in full view of the promised land the Modocs came upon them, and murdered them, men, women, and children, and to-day their bones lie bleaching around the lava beds. Their bodies were mutilated in the most horrible and shocking manner—too indecent and disgusting to allow of description.

There were other trains of emigrants coming along. Ben Wright, a brave and honorable man, gathered fifteen volunteers together, and went out to protect those emigrants. He met the Modocs, and they agreed to hold a council of war—to have a peace-talk. The agreement was that the Modocs should come, fifteen in number, leaving their arms in their camp, and that they would deliver up all the property they had taken from the murdered emigrants, and Ben Wright was to meet them with a like number of men, and without arms. What was the result? Instead of the Modocs coming without arms and with the property, they came well armed, forty-six in number, with weapons of war, ready to massacre Ben Wright and his men. When he asked them why they had come in that way, they commenced stringing their bows and making ready for fight. Then the fight commenced, and for nearly two days they continued to fight, until forty-three Modocs had bitten the dust. That is the sum-total of the Ben Wright massacre; that is all there is of it, the gentleman's statement to the contrary notwithstanding.

Those men, Mr. Burgess, Halleck, and others, reside in my county; they are men who have occupied the highest positions within the gift of the people of my county; they have held the office of sheriff, and other prominent positions of trust and honor, and are upright, honorable men; they stand ready to testify to the correctness of what I have said. Talk of Modoc honesty! Why, sir, they are the most treacherous devils that ever breathed the breath of life, and I tell you the best Modoc I ever saw was one that had been scalped by the Snake Indians.

Mr. SHANKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a couple of questions?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Certainly.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to ask how many of Captain Wright's men were killed?

Mr. LUTTRELL. One man was wounded.

Mr. SHANKS. That answers my purpose very well. My next question is, if nobody was to be armed at that meeting, how was it that Captain Wright's men were so thoroughly armed that, at the fight, forty-one Indians were killed, and only one of Captain Wright's men was wounded?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will tell you. When Captain Wright and his men came down over the hill they saw that the Indians were well armed. He said to his men, "Remain here, while I go down to talk with them, and upon the first evidence of treachery that you see fire upon them."

Mr. SHANKS. One word more. At the time General Canby was dealing with Captain Jack, the lines of the American army were closing around Captain Jack and his force.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I beg to differ with the gentleman; such was not the case.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will detain the committee but a minute longer. ["Go on!"] The gentleman says the American army was closing around the Modocs. I deny that statement. I have no doubt the gentleman believes he is correct, but I know differently. What was it the Modocs did at the time they were having this peace-talk with the brave General Canby, Dr. Thomas, and others? They came with a flag of truce and called out the gallant Lieutenant Sherwood from Colonel Bernard's regiment, and he went out without arms to see what they wanted, and when he was within range they shot him down; and at the same moment another party, led by the gentleman's much-abused friend, Captain Jack, fired on the peace commissioners. And these are the angelic creatures the gentleman wishes to excuse for butchering our frontier settlers. A more treacherous, blood-thirsty set of devils cannot be found this side of the infernal regions than these same Modocs. They have murdered in cold blood hundreds of our frontiersmen, sparing neither age nor sex, and visiting their dead bodies with the most shocking indignities.

Mr. SHANKS. Captain Hoag, who hanged Captain Jack, told me with his own lips that these Modocs were the best set of Indians he had ever seen, and he expressed his deep sorrow that Captain Jack was hanged.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS.] The amendment to the amendment proposes that the commission shall consist of one citizen and two Army officers.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, there were—ayes 80, noes not counted.

So Mr. NESMITH's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment as it now stands is confined to the first section, and proposes to substitute for the words "appoint three persons to act as commissioners," the words "detail two officers of the Army and appoint one citizen, who shall constitute a board of inquiry," &c.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no further amendments to the first section, the second section is now before the committee for amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The functions of this commission, as gentlemen are aware, are pretty broad, and of course contemplate in the end an appropriation of money out of the Treasury of the United States to compensate these persons for the losses which they may be shown to have sustained. In this view of the matter it seems to me desirable that the second section should be modified in one or two particulars. I will indicate these particulars before offering the amendments specifically.

After the word "them" in the fourth line, where the section now provides that the commissioners may "take testimony under oath of such witnesses as may appear before them," I think we should insert the words "voluntarily or upon their request." The section in its present form provides only for the taking of the testimony of such witnesses as may appear before the commissioners. I am aware that at the close of the third section it is provided that this board may order witnesses to appear before them. But I doubt somewhat the propriety of inserting such a provision, inasmuch as these commissioners certainly have no power to enforce such an order, unless when a person may refuse to appear the commissioners may commit or restrain as for a contempt and may impose fine or imprisonment, which in my judgment could not be allowed by such a bill as this. But the board should have authority to request witnesses to appear before them; otherwise the proceeding might be wholly ex parte. I do not understand that there is any objection to this amendment.

Mr. NESMITH. I assent to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment indicated by the gentleman from Vermont will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The remainder of this section seems to contemplate that this board shall make a finding, which I think ought not to be permitted. In my judgment, the board should have no power whatever except to take testimony and transmit it to the Secretary of the Interior, to be by him sent to Congress for consideration at some subsequent session. With this view, I move to strike out after the word "shall" in the ninth line the words "make up and;" so that it will read "shall transmit." I also move to strike out in the tenth and eleventh lines the words "their report, showing the result of such investigation, to which shall be appended." With these amendments, the clause will read "shall transmit to the Secretary of the Interior as soon as practicable the testimony taken by them."

Now, we know that this is the course which has been pursued with reference to what is called the "Texas border commission." The commissioners report the testimony, but do not report any finding or judgment. It appears to me that in a matter of this magnitude where the whole case is open, and probably wholly in dispute, this board ought not to be clothed with any power of making a finding which should be held to be conclusive (as some might hold it) upon Congress as a judgment upon the weight of the testimony reported. If we provide that the testimony taken by the board shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior and by him communicated to the next session of Congress for our consideration, we reach, it seems to me, all that ought to be accomplished by this bill. I therefore move the amendment I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Vermont will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move also to amend by inserting before the first proviso of the second section these words: "and the Secretary shall communicate said testimony to the next session of Congress for their consideration."

Mr. AVERILL. Say "this session."

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let it read, "and the Secretary shall communicate said testimony to Congress for their consideration."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair takes the liberty of suggesting that the word "commissioners," in the twelfth and sixteenth lines of this section, should be struck out and the words "the members of said board" substituted. If there be no objection the amendment will be made.

There was no objection; and the amendment was made accordingly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move in the second section, in the fourteenth line, to strike out "ten" and insert "thirty;" so it will read:

Provided, That said commissioners, before proceeding to hear such testimony shall give notice of the time and place of their meeting by publication thereof, at least thirty days previous, in the two newspapers published nearest the scene of said depredations.

I do not wish to meddle with a matter which is not within my personal experience, but it seems to me that ten days' notice is hardly sufficient in that sparely settled country, and I therefore have moved to increase the time to thirty days.

Mr. NESMITH. I am willing to agree to the gentleman's amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNULTA. I move to amend so as to make the third section conform to the previous amendments which have been agreed to by the House. I ask the Clerk to read the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the word "citizen" after the word "said" in line 1, section 3; strike out the letter "s" in the word "commissioners;" strike out the word "their" in line 2 and in line 3 and insert "his," and in line 3 strike out the word "each;" so it will read:

That said citizen commissioner shall be entitled to, and shall receive as compensation for his services, the sum of ten dollars per day, together with his traveling and other necessary expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois had better offer a substitute for the section.

Mr. McNULTA. My amendments only make it conform to the previous amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Illinois seems to misapprehend the language of the section. The mileage is to apply to the officers as well as the civilians, but if the amendment be adopted it will apply only to the civilians.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think we should strike out the words "and other necessary," so as to provide for paying only for their traveling expenses. As the section now reads these persons are to be paid their traveling and other necessary expenses. It seems to me the words "and other necessary" should be stricken out, and for this reason: a majority of the members of this commission will be detailed from the Army. Of course the expenses of the meeting of the board, their place of meeting, the stationery they may use, and things of that sort will be paid for from the Army appropriation bill, for it is a duty devolved particularly upon the Army. If we leave the section as it is the latitude will be too broad and may cover all imaginable expenses. If we give a compensation of ten dollars a day and traveling expenses to this civilian commissioner it is broad enough. I move the amendment to strike out the words "and other necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be first taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McNULTA'S amendments were adopted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I now move to strike out the words "and other necessary."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The latter clause of the third section reads:

And each of said commissioners is authorized and empowered to administer oaths, and also to order before them such witnesses as they may deem important.

The second section provides that these commissioners may take testimony under oath of such witnesses as may appear before them voluntarily or at their request. It appears to me we have no power, or ought not to give any power to these commissioners to order witnesses before them. At their request witnesses can appear before them. I suggest that it read that "each of said commissioners is authorized and empowered to administer oaths to the witnesses whose testimony may be taken by them."

Mr. NESMITH. That is right, and I am willing to agree to the amendment.

Mr. AVERILL. I hope the amendment will not prevail. The gentleman will see the force of retaining the language as it is when I make a brief statement. When this question was under discussion, the Committee on Indian Affairs particularly considered the question of bringing witnesses before this commission. It was very well understood all witnesses in favor of the claimants would come voluntarily before the commission. There was no question about that; the fear was there would be too many of that class. If no power be conferred upon the commission to order witnesses before it we will not be able to get at all the facts involved. The gentleman from California, who knows all about this country, suggested the commission should be clothed with power to bring witnesses before it. This language was put in the bill for that reason, and I hope it will be allowed to remain.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Suppose we do order witnesses before them and the witnesses do not come, what are the commissioners to do?

Mr. AVERILL. That is a question for legal determination.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. At the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. McNULTA. The commission should have the power to order witnesses before it, because we all desire to have a fair investigation on both sides.

Mr. BRADLEY. I wish to know whether in the amendments adopted regulating the pay of these commissioners it has been taken into account that two of them are to be appointed from the Army, and will, of course, draw their pay as officers of the Army. Will they still, in addition to their pay as officers of the Army, draw ten dollars a day and traveling expenses?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been amended to limit compensation provided in the bill to the civilian commissioner. The Chair will suggest, however, there is no provision for paying the traveling expenses and mileage of the Army officers.

Mr. AVERILL. They will draw it necessarily from their orders.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to offer a formal amendment for the purpose of presenting a general view in reference to this bill, which I should wish to be considered by the committee before final action.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate has been closed, and no debate can take place except on amendment.

Mr. CLYMER. Then I move to strike out the last section of the bill.

It appears to me that we are about entering upon a very dangerous policy if this bill is to become a law. If this commission is appointed and the damages ascertained and reported upon, it is preliminary to a request to be made to the Government of the United States to pay damages arising from what is termed the Modoc war. This war, if war it may be termed, was within the territorial limits of two States; and it is not possible, sir, that in accordance with the past action of this Government it should hold itself responsible for any damages arising in that way.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that this was nothing more than a great riot. Now, suppose there had been a riot in one of the old States—for instance in one of the mining districts of the State which I have the honor in part to represent—and suppose the Government had sent troops to suppress that riot, and that in its progress damage was done to the people generally, is it possible that this Congress would consider that question of damages and subsequently appropriate an amount to pay them? Now, as this is nothing more than an Indian riot, an Indian insurrection, which the Government was called upon to put down, it strikes me that the cases are parallel. And it strikes me that if one demand would be disregarded and ignored, this should be disregarded and ignored. I cannot say that there is any difference between the cases, and it seems to me that we should hesitate before we lay the foundation upon which future action could be demanded in the way of making reparation for these damages. I may be wrong in this view. It is the one, however, which has occurred to me, and one which I beg leave to suggest to the committee for its consideration.

Mr. AVERILL. Does the gentleman object on account of the precedent this would establish, or does he object to the principle of paying these victims of Indian depredations?

Mr. CLYMER. I object to both—both the precedent and the principle.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask the gentleman if he objects to having the facts laid before Congress?

Mr. CLYMER. I have no objection to facts at any time. But if the facts are to be used for demands for damages in the future, which may establish a precedent which would have evil results hereafter, I am decidedly opposed to the presentation even of the facts.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. The purpose of the committee has been to bring before Congress the facts relating to these Indian depredations, leaving it for Congress at a future time to say whether the facts justify any payment from the Treasury. And I trust, Mr. Chairman, there is no man in this House who would refuse to pay to these settlers what is rightfully due them from the Treasury of the United States, if the facts we seek to obtain justify it, and that is all this bill proposes.

Mr. CLYMER. I beg leave to ask whether it would be possible that Congress would appoint commissioners to go into the valley in my own State over which the confederates raided and make a report upon the damages there incurred; and would it not be perfectly apparent that if Congress did so the people of Pennsylvania would come here and demand compensation for the damages done?

The question being taken on Mr. CLYMER'S motion to strike out the third section, it was not agreed to.

Mr. TODD. I offer the following amendment to the third section:

In section 3, line 6, strike out the word "order," and insert the words "summon, and to compel the attendance by attachment."

As the bill now stands it authorizes the commission to order witnesses before it, but there is no power to compel their attendance, and their order may be disregarded and treated with contempt. If any power be conferred on the board to investigate they should have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, and it would seem to me to be more appropriate to change the word "order" to "summon," and to give the power to compel attendance by attachment.

Mr. AVERILL. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The question being taken on Mr. TODD'S proposed amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to strike out the last three words of the section.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in the discussion of the details of this bill the gentleman who has it in charge has almost entirely omitted to bring to the attention of the committee the very important principle which lies at the foundation of the whole bill; and it is this: This is a bill which contemplates the payment by the United States of losses incurred by our settlers in the Modoc war, because it is claimed that the United States failed to prosecute that war vigorously and efficiently. Now if any person has a claim against the Government of the United States on this account, every person in the like case has a similar claim. Every citizen of Pennsylvania who can establish the fact that the Government was not sufficiently vigorous in preventing the invasion of Pennsylvania, and every loyal citizen of the Southern States who can show that if the war for the suppression of the rebellion had been prosecuted with due diligence it would have been shortened and terminated before his property was lost, has a like claim.

Now, it is true that this bill does not in words promise to these settlers in Oregon and California any such result. It simply establishes a commission, and requires it to ascertain these losses, and to report them and the circumstances under which they occurred. But it occurs to me that the passage of such a bill, inviting the citizen to submit proof of his losses, is a pledge of the faith of the Government that, if his losses have been incurred by the fault of the United States in not prosecuting the war with sufficient vigor, those losses shall be paid. When you advertise to them to bring in their itemized bill of charges, and to be at the expense of producing proof, through the mechanism of witnesses, no one can convince them that it is not an undertaking on the part of the Government to pay them their losses. And I am astonished that my vigilant friends, the guardians of the Treasury, the chairmen of the two principal committees of the House, have allowed a bill of this kind to pass without some animadversion from them.

Mr. GARFIELD. When did it pass?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It has not passed yet, but it has received two readings.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. AVERILL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. When the bill was passed providing for a commission to sit and examine damages and award the amounts due in the case of Minnesota, did he oppose it?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not remember the bill the gentleman alludes to.

Mr. AVERILL. It was passed in the winter of 1862.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Ah! that was almost before I was born.

Mr. AVERILL. I supposed that the gentleman had been in Congress at that time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. No, sir; I have only been in Congress four years.

Mr. AVERILL. I state to the committee that that was the precedent upon which the committee acted.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Now will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. AVERRILL. Certainly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Do you as chairman of the committee reporting this bill believe that the United States, under any circumstances that you know of, ought to pay these settlers for their losses in this war?

Mr. AVERILL. Yes, sir; and I will give you my reasons.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then the committee will notice that the chairman of the committee reporting this bill reports it because he thinks the United States is bound to pay these expenses, and if we pass it, it will be to that extent a preparation for such payment.

Mr. AVERILL. The gentleman misapprehends the whole subject. The committee have reported this bill because they thought it right to listen to the demands of these claimants, and that a commission should be formed to go out and examine them. These are poor men, who have not money to employ attorneys and scarcely money enough to buy a sheet of paper. All these things were presented to the committee.

Now, this proposition is a simple and a naked one, that a commission be sent there in order that they may not be deprived of their rights; and that the rights of the Government may not be infringed on or injured, it is provided that the commission may order all testimony to be taken and make up their report. The committee did not feel that they ought to withhold the allowing of such a commission to be created, and it provided for the expenses of the commission to go there. And I do not think there is a man in the House who believes that the Government should withhold generous justice—for the payment is generous. I do not think there is any member of the House who believes that the Government should withhold the generous justice due under the circumstances, and it might be considered generous justice as applied to the creation of this commission.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I withdraw this amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew the amendment. I should have no objection at all to the appointment of a commission if the appointment and the work it might do would bring any result on which Congress would be justified in giving relief. Suppose a commission should be appointed and its expenses paid, and its report made; what then will we do with its report? These outrages and depredations were committed by one of two classes of persons; either by private robbers and murderers or by public enemies. If they were private murderers, then who in this House proposes to adopt the principle that Congress should pay the damages inflicted upon citizens by private robbers and murderers? If on that basis we pass this bill, then whenever your house is broken into, Mr. Chairman, you may call upon Congress to make you good for your loss; whenever your pocket is picked, bring in your bill to Congress; whenever an assault and battery is committed upon you, and your coat is torn, bring in your bill and call upon the Treasury to patch it.

But it may be said the Modocs were public enemies. I see that the bill speaks of "the Modoc war." If this be the basis of the measure, then the House is asked to pay citizens for the loss they have sustained by the ravages of a public enemy. Let us examine that doctrine.

When Buffalo was burnt to ashes by the enemy in the war of 1812 with Great Britain, the case was laid before Congress; and that was probably the strongest case ever presented. The question was debated by the magnates in both Houses. Buffalo came here saying that it was the duty of the General Government to protect the frontier against the common enemy, and because the Government failed to afford the requisite protection that city was laid in ashes; that therefore the loss should not fall on Buffalo alone, but upon the whole nation. The great statesmen of that period, after a full and able discussion, concluded that the laws of war and the practice of civilized nations did not sustain a demand for payment for ravages by the common enemy. It is one of those casualties which, like lightning and flood, must be borne by those who suffer them. They would not listen to the claim of Buffalo, nor pay her one dollar.

I say, sir, that from the beginning of our Government until now, unless there may have been some unfortunate slip that Congress has committed, like that which the gentleman suggests in 1862, and about which I know nothing, this Government has never recognized such a thing as an obligation to pay individual citizens for losses inflicted upon them by the public enemy.

I have said the bill speaks of the "Modoc war." Why, sir, if this bill passes, then let all the Northern States bring in their enormous bills; let Gettysburgh come here; let the whole of Southern Ohio and Indiana come in here with their Morgan-raid claims for damages done by the rebel force. An agent of one of those States is waiting at your door to ask you to pay out a large sum for claims growing out of the Morgan raid. Thousands of such claims will come trooping in here if you pass this bill, and the sluices of the Treasury must be opened: a vast host of claimants will come up here if you pass this bill, and you can only answer them by opening wide the doors of the Treasury and letting the last dollar be taken from it, and that before the winter is over.

Sir, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one motion pending already, to strike out the last clause.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is suggested by one of my colleagues who sits near me that the remark I have made in reference to the Morgan-raid claims may be misunderstood; and I therefore add, that the Ohio agent now here is not asking for the payment for damages done or for property taken by the enemy, but for what was taken by our own Army. I distinguish of course between the case of property taken by out own Army for public uses and the case of property taken from citizens by the public enemy. But a large share of the original Morgan-raid claims was of this latter class, and should this bill pass, Ohio would have a right to demand their payment.

Mr. LOWE. The suggestions of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] are certainly very pertinent in this connection. But I beg the indulgence of the Committee of the Whole for a very few minutes, in order that I may state what the Committee on Indian Affairs believe to be the right of public policy and the ground of public right upon which this bill should be placed.

In the first place, it may be unfortunate that this bill refers to "the Modoc war." I undertake to say here to-day that there has been no Modoc war in any national or international sense. By the Constitution of the United States the Congress alone declares war. The Congress of the United States has declared no war and has recognized no war with the Modoc Indians. On the contrary, the United States were at peace with the Modoc Indians in a national and in a legal sense. So the argument does not apply that, inasmuch as these Indians were a common enemy, therefore compensation cannot be made for their depredations.

What do the statutes of the United States provide on this subject? Is there no mode known to the law and under the Constitution by which citizens of the United States shall have a remedy for losses which they sustain and for injuries which they suffer at the hand of the Indians in charge of the Government? We cannot apply to the Modoc Indians the formula of a nationality, for they are not a nation. We cannot pursue them in a court of justice, for there is no process known to the law by which they can be there reached.

But the statutes of the United States have substantially provided a mode of relief. And the provisions of this bill are but a modification of what is provided by the statutes; it is not different in principle. By the act of 1802, the intercourse act with the Indian tribes, it is expressly provided that when any member of an Indian tribe in amity with the United States, in his own country, commits any depredation upon the person or property of a citizen of the United States——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LOWE. Very well.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Were not Captain Jack and his associates condemned by a military commission?

Mr. LOWE. I do not see that that has any application to this case; military commissions have done a great many things. But the gentleman will pardon me; I wish to refer to the statutes of the United States upon this subject. By the act of 1802 it is expressly provided that if any members of any Indian tribe, with which the United States is in amity, shall within the Indian country commit any depredations upon or take any property belonging to the citizens of the United States who may lawfully be in that country, then reparation therefor shall be made by the United States. The same principle is incorporated in the intercourse act of 1834. The guarantee of the Government of the United States is there given that depredations committed by Indians shall be compensated by the Government of the United States if compensation cannot be obtained from the Indian tribe.

Now, we have upon this border thousands of the citizens of the United States who have been deprived of their liberty or property by the Indians, as others have been deprived of their lives. And unless remedy can be obtained in some way through the Congress of the United States, then there can be no remedy for citizens in that condition. The courts are closed to them, and, except through the remedies which Congress may furnish our own citizens, are defenseless in their property and their rights.

If the humblest citizen of the United States upon foreign soil is at all interfered with in his rights or in his property, the whole power of the Government—the Army and the Navy—is marshaled in his defense. And shall it be said that a citizen of the United States upon our own territory and within our own borders shall be defenseless and unprotected?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD to strike out the last clause of section 3 of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw that motion. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not debatable.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 85, noes 64.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. NESMITH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. AVERILL were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 79, noes 68.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. This vote of the committee makes it necessary for the committee now to rise and to report its action to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had stricken out the enacting clause of House bill No. 1586, to provide for ascertaining losses sustained by citizens of Southern Oregon and Northern California, by reason of Indian depredations in 1872 and 1873; also that the committee had directed him to report sundry other bills to the House, with a recommendation that the same be passed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House concur in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole as to House bill No. 1586.

The SPEAKER. That is the first question before the House. No motion is necessary.

The question being put, the Speaker declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. NESMITH called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 85, not voting 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALBRIGHT in the chair.) The House meets to-day as in Committee of the Whole for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] has the floor.

ATLANTIC AND GREAT WESTERN CANAL.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, the question of increased facilities for more and cheaper transportation is the great question to which the attention of Congress is now called by all classes and interests in every section of the Union. This question overshadows all others in its grandeur and magnitude. The public opinion of the country has exhausted all the forms of expression through which it could be heard in favor of the adoption of some means for its accomplishment. The press, public meetings, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, conventions of governors, of members of Congress, of States, and of the nation, and official reports of congressional committees, have all spoken the same language upon this subject without a single note of discord. They have all recognized its necessity and sought its solution. The mineral, mechanical, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests are all vitally interested in this great question. The representatives of the people cannot, dare not, postpone favorable action upon it.

The rapid increase in the population and productions of the country has created the necessity for cheaper means of putting these productions upon a market that will facilitate the exchange of commodities, enhance the value of labor, and thus reward the toils of industry. Experience has demonstrated the inefficiency of railway transportation to meet the exigencies of the case; hence the public attention has been directed to the feasibility of opening water ways for commercial communication between the great valley of the Mississippi and the Atlantic Ocean. Among the various lines that have interposed their claims to favorable consideration, and pre-eminent among them in the superiority of its advantages, stands the Atlantic and Great Western Canal. Basing its claims upon the superiority of its advantages, it challenges the aid which I invoke from the Government for its construction.

The President, in his annual message to the second session of the Forty-second Congress, indicates his readiness to recommend Government aid to such enterprises as will cheapen transportation and facilitate the exchange of commercial commodities, whenever it is clearly shown that they are of "national interest, and when completed will be of a value commensurate with their cost."

Now, in regard to the Atlantic and Great Western Canal, I undertake to demonstrate the following propositions:

First. That it is feasible.

Secondly. That when completed it will be of a value commensurate with its cost.

Thirdly. That it is a work of national interest.

If these propositions can be established, it follows that it is the duty, as well as the interest, of the Government, to aid its construction. Is the connection of the Mississippi and its affluents with the Atlantic Ocean feasible? Is it practicable? There are two infallible tests of truth, and but two. One is trial, experiment; this test is based upon the evidence of facts. The other infallible test is mathematical demonstration. Tried by both of these tests this enterprise is feasible beyond all doubt.

If the question were left to the speculations of mere theorists, reasonable doubts of its practicability might be safely entertained. But this is not left to the uncertainty of conjecture. The fact is that these highways of trade and transit have been constructed and successfully operated; for centuries increasing the wealth and ministering to the wants of individuals, cities, and nations. They are to-day great arteries through which commerce flows in China, Russia, the Netherlands, Italy, France, Great Britain, and the United States. The genius of Lesseps has but recently astonished the world in mingling, through the Suez Canal the waters of the classic sea that bore Cæsar and his fortunes with those which overwhelmed Pharaoh and his hosts; and thus revolutionized the commerce of the East, if not of the world. Without descending to particulars or referring to details, it may be stated as a historic fact that the feasibility of constructing canals and the utility of canal navigation stand demonstrated upon the evidence of trial and success.

But it may be said that this does not prove the feasibility of a particular canal—of the Atlantic and Great Western Canal. I reply that it unquestionably proves its feasibility, provided it can be shown that there are no physical, no engineering difficulties that render its construction impracticable. This question involves the other test of truth, mathematical demonstration. The proof has been furnished by the actual survey of the route by an able and accomplished engineer, Major McFarland, who reports that "there are no formidable engineering difficulties along the line." It had been supposed that the Sand Mountain presented a formidable difficulty to the construction of this work, yet an actual survey shows it to be perfectly practicable across that supposed barrier.

This engineer, in his report, says that—

> The engineer's survey shows two practicable routes across it, one passing up the valley of Short Creek, the other up the valley of Town Creek, on either of which an abundant supply of water for the service of the canal can be obtained during eight months of the year, while during the remaining four months, by resorting to the use of storage reservoirs, a sufficient supply may be obtained.

The feasibility of this route has been ascertained by precisely the same means that the practicability of all other canal routes has been ascertained, namely, by the actual survey of skilled engineers. It being established that it can be constructed, that there are no engineering difficulties in the way, let us inquire whether, when completed, it will be of a value commensurate with its cost.

The consideration of this proposition involves an examination into the cost of construction, the revenues it will yield when completed, and the contribution it will make to the material wealth of the country. And here we enter upon no unexplored wilderness of speculation, or wild dream of fancy, but we are guided by the safe and steady light of experience. The engineer estimates the cost of opening this line of water communication from Guntersville, on the Tennessee River, to Brunswick, Georgia, on the Atlantic Coast, suitable for barges carrying one hundred and seventy tons during the low-water season and three hundred tons during the ordinary stages of water, upon a liberal basis, at $34,354, 291, including river improvements.

The entire cost of the Erie Canal up to the 30th of September, 1862, was $38,977,831.16, which, with interest up to that date, amounted to $52,491,915.74; and after deducting expenses $12,518,860.03, there remained a net profit of $59,264,810.62, not only sufficient up to that time to pay the entire cost of construction with interests but leaving a balance or surplus of nearly $7,000,000 for the State of its gross earnings. Since the 30th of September, 1862, the net earnings were about $20,000,000 more. Since the completion of this great work, less than a half century, its income has paid the entire cost of construction and yielded a net profit of $27,000,000.

These facts furnish a safe basis for the calculation of the revenues which the Atlantic and Great Western Canal will yield when completed in the way of tolls. Indeed, all the advantages of cost of construction, distance of route, climatic obstructions, &c., are in favor of this, and against the Erie Canal.

The distinguished engineer, in his report referred to, says of this line, comparing its merits with the lake and canal, the James River and Kanawha, and the Mississippi routes, that—

> It may be said for it, that while it enjoys every advantage possessed by the others, it is superior to them all in this, that it will never be obstructed by ice; will never be rendered impassable by drought; does not descend sufficiently low into the heated regions to have its cargoes injured by heat or moisture; will require no rehandling of cargoes between the points of shipment and discharge; and will cost but little more than the Erie Canal enlarged, while its capacity will be greater, and no doubt it will, like the Erie Canal, pay for the original outlay, interest, expenses of repair and service, with a large balance to its credit, in the course of thirty years.

Taking Saint Louis as the great center of trade in the valley of the Mississippi, and the point from which western products start in search for the Atlantic coast and a foreign market, the advantages of distance in favor of this line are as follows:

	Miles.
From Saint Louis by lakes and Erie Canal to New York	1,950
From New York to Liverpool	3,150
Total distance	5,100
From Saint Louis to New Orleans	1,270
From New Orleans to Liverpool	4,756
Total distance	6,026
From Saint Louis to Savannah by proposed canal	1,508
From Savannah to Liverpool	3,390
Total distance	4,898

The distance in favor of the Atlantic and Great Western Canal against the lake and Erie route is 210 miles, and against the Mississippi, via New Orleans, is 1,136 miles, with a corresponding difference in favor of the Savannah, in the cost of transportation. Superadd the fact that this route is unobstructed by ice, while the Erie is annually obstructed for four or five months; and that no damage results to cargoes from climatic causes, as is the case with the Mississippi route, and the question of advantages between these lines, ceases to be debatable.

It is not my purpose, however, to disparage the claims of any route, but to show the superior advantages of the particular one whose claims to favorable consideration I am now urging. The necessities of the country demand the construction of every line that will develop our domestic commerce and secure an outlet to the ocean for our trade abroad.

If the Erie Canal has shown such results under these comparative disadvantages, what may we not safely expect from the Atlantic and Great Western, with the superior advantages which it possesses. To these may be added the greater necessity now for transportation than when the Erie was constructed. It developed and built up the commerce upon which it has fed. While the subduing of the wilderness and the honest industry of toiling millions have crowded the great valley of the Mississippi with a vast surplus, that wastes and rots while thousands in the East are perishing with famine, whose hunger our bounty could appease if we could but convey it to them. But it is not only in India that bread is needed—the exhausted States of the ruined South likewise want it.

The Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, in the second session of the Forty-second Congress, in their able report say that—

> The census of 1870 shows that Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, and Florida produce 57,215,600 bushels of grain. Their average consumption, according to data furnished by the Bureau of Statistics, is 104,521,470 bushels. This leaves a deficit of 47,305,870 bushels to be supplied by other States. As the larger portion of this grain is needed along the sea-board, in what is known as the cotton belt, we may assume the distance from Saint Louis to Savannah as the average distance this grain is moved. This would make the cost of transportation on each ton $14.40, at 1¼ cents per ton per mile. The cost for the same distance by this canal would be $4.88. This is a saving of $9.52 upon each ton, and an aggregate of $13,647,024.72 upon one article in a single year; the development of a latent value of nearly $14,000,000, to be divided between the producer and the consumer.

To state the case in other words, this canal would save to the producers of the West and the planters of the South in the transportation of corn alone for one year nearly $14,000,000; and this amount alone, for three years, would more than pay the cost of the canal. This single fact, undisputed and undisputable, demonstrates the value as well as the necessity of this great work.

Unquestionably it is. The development of the productive resources of the country, the increase of its wealth, and the expansion of its commerce, foreign and domestic, are all matters of national interest; and if these interests of the country are promoted by the construction of this highway of trade, then it is a work of national interest. Will it affect favorably the productive resources of the country?

Let us examine this question a moment.

The States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida are adapted to the production of cotton, while large portions of these States are not well adapted to the production of grain. The average yield of corn is less than ten dollars per acre, while the average yield of cotton is about forty dollars. It is of course the interest of the farmers to cultivate cotton, because it yields a greater profit; it pays better than grain. But it is cheaper to raise grain than to purchase it even at a nominal price in the West, because of the expense of transporting it.

The Committee on Commerce, heretofore referred to, say that in those States—

> The scarcity of food and the high prices demanded for it force more than five million acres into grain. This takes away from the production of cotton about one-half of the labor and capital of the South. These acres planted in cotton would add two million five hundred thousand bales to our exports, and increase the value of the exports $200,000,000 annually, which would cause the wealth of the world to flow to us instead of away from us, as it has been doing in times past.

Statistics show the values of imports and exports for the eight months ending August 31, 1871, as follows:

Imports	$408,503,331
Exports	389,242,497
Leaving against us	19,260,834

For the same period in 1872:

Imports	$479,924,793
Exports	391,920,267
Leaving balance against us	88,004,526

This balance, together with the interest on the foreign debt, must be paid in coin. Yet if this channel of trade were opened so that the planters in these four States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida could obtain their grain supplies from the West cheaper than they can make them on their exhausted lands, they could and would put these five million acres now in grain into cotton, and raise thereon two million five hundred thousand bales, contributing annually to our exports $200,000,000, which alone, in the year 1872, would have turned the tide of foreign trade in our favor to the extent of $112,000,000.

Cotton constitutes our most valuable export. The statistics show a most startling diminution in its production for the last year, which results from the necessity to diversify the crops in the cotton States. A corresponding diminution in our exports and a corresponding increase in the balance of trade against us necessarily ensue. If this state of things continues long, with the competition in the production of cotton, the foreign market will be mainly supplied from the East, and we will make but little, if any, more than will supply our own factories. How can this result be obviated? It can only be done by reducing the cost of transportation, so that these cotton States can obtain their supplies of bread and meat from the crowded granaries of the West at a less cost than it requires to make them. Then the entire labor and capital of the cotton States will be directed to the production of cotton. The coin will be kept in the country, the West will be supplied with a market that will compensate labor, the currents of commerce will be stimulated, and the productive energies of the country vitalized.

The development of the resources of the country, of any element of wealth or power, in any State or section, assumes the importance and rises to the dignity of a national interest. The constantly multiplying wants of society have increased, and are increasing, the demand for two articles especially at a rate not hitherto known. I allude to iron and coal.

There is on the line of this proposed canal a region in which iron and coal are found, unsurpassed, if equaled, in the extent of its quantity or the superiority of their quality. This belt of iron-ore and coal lies at the eastern base of Lookout Mountain, and extends from near Chattanooga to the Coosa River at Gadsden in Alabama, a distance of about eighty miles. The superior quality of both the ore and coal has been shown by practical tests and scientific analysis. Boundless forests and exhaustless water-power are in proximity to these great elements of national wealth, yet they are almost wholly valueless, practically, for the want of transportation.

The development of these interests would not antagonize the coal and iron interests of other sections of the country, because the demand for them is an ever-increasing one. On the contrary, similarity of interests identifies the different sections of the Union, harmonizes conflicting views of constitutional construction and administrative policy, and thus unites the different sections of the Union. It is a great mistake to suppose that because this great country is diversified in climate, soil, and productions, therefore the interests of the different sections are antagonistic. This very diversity is the bond of unity. What one section has, another has not, and what one section does, another does not, so that the producer, the manufacturer, the merchant, and the common carrier are all mutually and relatively dependent on each other.

The country needs a statesmanship whose grasp comprehends the interests of all, and a patriotism whose ardor, ignoring local prejudices, embraces the entire Union.

I present another fact, showing the national importance of this water-way. It will give an outlet to the Atlantic Ocean, to sixteen thousand five hundred miles of inland navigation, embraced in the term "Mississippi and its tributaries," and will connect with it five thousand miles of similar navigation, penetrating every portion of four States, connecting with the Atlantic, thus distributing at home and pouring into the foreign market by the shortest and the cheapest route the treasures of the most productive region on the globe, drained by twenty-one thousand five hundred miles of inland navigation. The simple statement of these facts startles us with the stupendous magnitude and national grandeur of this enterprise.

With every element of wealth, surrounded with profusion and burdened with excess, we are starving at a banquet and famishing at a fountain.

The national debt amounts to $2,293,170,689.43, upon $1,712,749,200 of which we pay interest in coin. The revenues fail to meet current expenses on a peace basis. Commerce decaying; labor disorganized in the South, and unproductive in the West; starving freedmen imploring the Government to feed them upon rations issued from the War Department; finances deranged; factories running on half time, and thousands of operatives turned out of employment in the North; agrarian mobs and communistic associations clamoring for bread or blood in the cities; railroad magnates monopolizing the profits of industry, and money-changers defiling the temple with a heartless idolatry at the shrine of Mammon—this state of things must be changed; these evils must be corrected. If we would avert from the country the fearful crisis which the deadly conflict between capital and labor, already inaugurated, will precipitate upon us, we must provide channels for the distribution of the productions of the country; the expansion of its commerce; the development of its resources, and the reward of its labor.

How can the means be obtained?

The bill now pending provides them. Its passage, in my judgment, will secure the completion of this work in a short time, and without any liability to the Government except the use of its credit.

The bill provides that upon the completion of each section of ten miles, to be certified by an engineer under the direction of the War Department and approved by the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury is required to indorse said certificate upon the bonds of the company, not to exceed $80,000 per mile, the bonds to constitute a first mortgage upon the canal and all the property of the company. The bonds may be deposited with the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall thereupon issue to the company currency notes, not to exceed in amount the bonds deposited. As soon as the work is completed the company shall pay into the Treasury annually not less than 6 per cent. of the whole amount of the currency so issued for the redemption of said currency; and as the notes are redeemed the bonds shall be canceled. If the company fail to pay the 6 per cent. annually, within thirty days after it becomes due, the Secretary of the Treasury may take possession of it and apply its earnings to the redemption of the currency.

This scheme will secure the means to open this line. It involves no danger to the Government; no taxes are to be imposed; no money to be borrowed, and no risks incurred.

The notes are not to be issued until ten miles of the work or line are completed, and upon that, and each consecutive ten miles, the certified bonds of the company will constitute a mortgage. The Government will be amply secured. It will pay no interest, and the company will pay no interest. The annual payment of the 6 per cent. will redeem the currency in sixteen years; and if the company fail to pay it within thirty days after it becomes due the Government may take charge of it and apply its income to the redemption of the notes.

These notes would be distributed among the laboring class, men of small means, who greatly need it, and in a section where the circulation does not exceed two dollars per capita, and where the people are clamorous for an increase of currency. It would be placed beyond the control of bank and railroad monopolists, and thus open this great national highway of trade, and at the same time supply the people in the South and West, where they most need it, with money.

The necessity for the means of exchanging commercial commodities without absorbing the profits of labor, and a desire for relief from the dominion of extortioners and the monopoly of corporations, have united the honest, toiling masses of the country in the demand for legislative interposition. Nor will they cease until this demand meets with a response from their representatives. If we fail to respond they will fill our places with those who will. Already hundreds of thousands of patriotic men have sundered the ligaments that bind them to party, and united upon this question; and their voice comes up to this Capitol, like the roar of gathering waters, demanding a market unburdened by monopoly and extortion for the products of their labor.

These hardy farmers of the South and the great West demand something more than the repeal of the salary bill. They are for economy; but it is not that sort of economy that keeps up the expenses of thirty custom-houses that yield no revenues to the Government; that sort of economy that expends annually millions of the public money in paving the streets and beautifying the grounds of this magnificent city while their homes are covered with mortgages. They want that sort of economy that equalizes the burdens and benefactions of the Government; that distributes its productions, husbands its resources, and develops its wealth.

FINANCE.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, although I am a new member of this House, and make no pretensions to financial wisdom, yet I desire to submit a few remarks upon this subject which for the last five months has occupied almost the undivided attention of the American people.

The condition of the country during that period has been singular, and, indeed, painful. In the midst of plenty, the land loaded with a superabundant harvest, every branch of business prosperous, and the entire population engaged in profitable employment, we are stopped in our career of prosperity with a shock. The pulse of commercial life stands still; the doors of the artisan, the manufacturer, and the banker are alike closed; the vehicles which were transporting our harvests to the needy markets of the world cease to move; and bankruptcy, naked and bony, stalks through the land, sweeping away in a day fortunes which only a life-time had acquired.

Only five months ago, sir, all the great interests of the country were in a condition exceedingly gratifying. Our agricultural products were abundant and commanded fair prices, and they were in great demand abroad. Our manufactures were flourishing; our shipping interest was rapidly reviving; our commerce was highly prosperous; the balance of trade largely in our favor. The currency of the country, reduced to a peace footing, and resting upon the credit of the nation, though not convertible into coin, was sound. It was of equal value all over the country; and it was, in fact, the best we had ever had. Its circulation was free, and the banks were in good standing; our mines had yielded seventy-three millions of the precious metals during the last year; our national and commercial credit was good at home and abroad; taxes were becoming lighter, the public debt was steadily diminishing, and we were at peace with all the nations of the world. No cloud, even so large as a man's hand, was seen above the horizon. Such was the condition of our country last September; yet from that clear sky the bolt came so suddenly that the catastrophe overtook the prudent and the rash alike. Thousands upon thousands who five months ago were pursuing with economy and industry their accustomed avocations found themselves suddenly arrested in their progress, their employment gone, and their bright hopes and prospects blasted, apparently forever.

Manufactures stood still, or ran on short time and at reduced wages; the banks and leading merchants and tradesmen suspended payment; credit, which had its ramifications through our whole social and financial system, always sensitive, first took alarm, and then fell beneath the blow, and business died. Men could no longer meet their engagements, except at ruinous interests; property shrunk greatly in value, thousands failed, and none attempted to move forward.

Such was the condition of things when Congress came together last December. All eyes were then turned toward Washington; expectations centered here. Never had a legislative body so fine an opportunity, and never was an opportunity so entirely thrown away. Two and a half months have passed, and we have accomplished—what?

The financial crisis was the result of a financial scare. It cannot be attributed to the nature of the currency, for the currency has not depreciated in value, notwithstanding the enormous strain upon it during the entire panic. It cannot be attributed to a redundant currency, for it is clear the currency was not redundant. It cannot be attributed to a scarcity of currency, for there has been no drain upon it, and the amount of currency in the country had been found sufficient for the legitimate business of the country. We had then in circulation, $603,000,000, $53,000,000 more than we had in 1869—a ratio of increase duly proportionate to the increase of population and wealth.

You will remember that the other day the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] for whom I entertain a respect amounting to admiration, had read to you his prophecy which he ventured to make, he said, in 1867, that the contraction of the currency, as then proposed by the Government, would produce this very panic. We had also in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the same year, a like prediction, that the redundancy of the currency would produce the same result. I desire to ask the attention of the House for a moment to the amount of currency in existence during the time which the gentleman from Pennsylvania supposes has produced this result.

In 1869 we had an actual circulation, on the 30th day of June, of $550,109,245.31; on the same day in 1870 we had $546,492,297.90; on the same day in 1871 we had $554,363,310.69; on the same day in 1872 we had $572,136,912.53; on the same day in 1873 we had $663,236,991.33; so that from 1869 to 1873 we had increased our circulation to the amount of $53,000,000. Mr. Speaker, if that is the contraction which has produced this panic, what would expansion have produced?

The panic cannot be attributed to overtrading, for it is clear there had not been sufficient overtrading to produce such a result. Investments in the main had not been injudicious.

The panic was a scare. Jay Cooke & Co. had with tremendous energy been pushing forward their railroad through the Northwest, in advance of immediate necessity. Their credit was unlimited. Their name was a synonym of honesty and honor. They had built churches, contributed heavily to almost all benevolent enterprises, and they had the entire confidence of the country. Their railroad bonds sold largely everywhere. They had agents in almost every town and school district to sell them. They had become immensely indebted to the moneyed institutions of the country. They had used it—their unlimited credit—everywhere to carry forward their great undertaking.

The usual demand for money which the autumn brings with it came. Accommodations were more difficult. The accumulated load was too heavy, and Jay Cooke & Co. went down with a sudden crash, which shook the confidence of the whole country.

There never was a failure in which so many felt their own private interest so directly affected. We had maintained and extended our credit until all were interested in its preservation and continuance. It had become interwoven into our whole financial and social system, as it ever must be in a commercial state. It extended everywhere, and reached everything. Credit is delicate, and sensitive to every touch; and when this blow was struck every man felt the vibration and became alarmed. Creditors demanded their dues, depositors their money which had been deposited on call, but loaned on time. Confidence was gone, reason had fled, and panic ruled. One after another great houses went down, and there was one uninterrupted progression of disaster, discredit, and dismay.

The remedy was a restoration of confidence.

The condition of the country when Congress assembled in December was like what that of England had been in 1847, but resulting from totally different causes—theirs from unparalleled overtrading and speculation; ours from an unparalleled affright. That was to England an era of commercial ruin, which stamped its lasting impress upon English history, and whose foot-prints are still visible among the English people. Her needy population thronged the streets of her great cities, demanding employment or bread; and so great had become the pressure for money that 50 per cent. was offered for its use for nine days, to avoid bankruptcy. Yet the Bank of England could render no aid. Its charter forbade the issue of notes beyond £14,000,000, unless secured by an equal amount of gold in the vaults of the bank. Yet it had £8,000,000 locked up in its deposit department which its charter forbade the issue department to touch.

The commercial community begged for notes. "Let us have notes," they said. "Charge us whatever interest you please. We do not intend to take them, because we shall not want them. Only tell us we can get them, and that will restore confidence."

Sir Robert Peel and his ministers were compelled to yield, and to authorize the bank directors to enlarge the amount of their discounts, upon approved security, beyond the amount authorized by law. Says Sir Archibald Alison:

> Never was a step taken by government attended with such immediate and beneficial effects as this was. It never required to be acted upon. The knowledge that it had been granted was sufficient to dispel the panic.

When Congress assembled we had $44,000,000 reserve of greenbacks locked up in the Treasury which the law did not authorize to be reissued. Under the pressure of necessity a portion of it, it is true, had been paid out by the Secretary; but the country felt and still feels that it was an unauthorized issue, and there was no confidence that the amount issued would remain in circulation.

The very first duty of Congress after it organized was to have authorized and legalized the issue of that $44,000,000 reserve; not that it was absolutely needed for the currency of the country, but the measure was absolutely required to restore confidence to the country.

The effect would have been magical. It would have convinced the country that money was abundant, and that there was no occasion for locking up and hoarding. The vaults of the banks and the chests of deposits, which had become the graves of the circulation, would then have given up their dead; business would have at once revived, and the $44,000,000 would not have been required, and our desks would not have been loaded, as they now are, with the thousand and one prescriptions for this financial disease, with tables to prove the amount of money we need—an ass's load of which is not worth a dime.

But we have driveled on and accomplished nothing until the patient shows some signs of improvement from its own inherent strength. I said we had accomplished nothing; but after this long incubation we have got from the Committee on Banking and Currency, House bill No. 1577 entitled "A bill to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes," which bill I purpose now briefly to examine.

The first section is as follows:

> That section 31 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved on the 3d day of June, in the year 1864, be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits, in all respects as provided for in the said section.

To this I see no objection.

The bank act, section 22, as amended by section 1 of the act of 1870, limits the amount of national-bank notes for circulation to $354,000,000, and also limits the amount of circulating notes of any one bank to $500,000.

This bill proposes (section 2) to repeal both of these limitations, and to allow an unlimited amount of currency, and to authorize banks to have an unlimited amount of capital and circulation.

Was a proposition like this ever before entertained by any legislative body or adopted by any government? What is this proposition? It is to surrender a high prerogative of government, that of regulating and controlling the currency, to the Shylocks, the speculators, and the bankers of the land. Judge Story says:

> The power to coin money is one of the ordinary prerogatives of sovereignty, and is almost universally exercised in order to preserve a proper circulation.

Private banks are organized with the consent of the Government; but the Government retains the right to regulate all of their operations at pleasure.

It is only by virtue of the constitutional power of coining money and regulating the value thereof that Congress has the power to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes and bank bills circulating as money. Mr. Webster says:

> The right of issuing paper intended for circulation in the place of and as the representative of metallic currency is derived merely from the power of coining and regulating the metallic currency. * * * * * It would be a startling proposition that this prerogative of coining money held by the Government was liable to be defeated, counteracted, or impeded by another prerogative, held in other hands, of authorizing a paper circulation.

And yet that is just what this bill proposes to do.

You may say that by this bill the Government alone authorizes the issue of the circulating notes. I beg your pardon, sir. When you have passed this bill you have parted with all control over the matter of issuing circulating bank notes; and when men, under this bill, come to the Treasury with their bonds, you are compelled to issue to them notes in any amount they require. The only limit there can be is the amount of the national debt, which is represented in bonds.

Pass this bill, sir, and you will bind the Government hand and foot; you will strip it of all power over the currency of the country, and you will prostrate it at the feet of the money-mongers of the world. Pass this bill, and you will deprive yourselves of all power ever to resume specie payments, until such time as the money-mongers, in their grace, may permit you to do so; because, with such a volume of currency as this bill will allow, there never can be resumption. Pass this bill, and you will have taken the first step in unsettling values to an extent never before known; your currency will become a mockery, and your credit a by-word. Pass this bill, and you will place yourself exactly in the attitude of England, when, by the bank act of 1844, the Bank of England was allowed to issue £14,000,000 upon approved securities, but was compelled, over and above that sum, to issue notes to all persons who should bring to their bank an equal amount of gold. The balance of trade was largely then in England's favor. Gold flowed continually to her shores, and there being no demand for it abroad to pay foreign debts, it nearly all found its way into the vaults of the bank. Circulating notes were issued for it, producing an enormous inflation of currency, and resulting in the railroad mania, and other wild speculations, such as no country on the globe had ever known.

I ask the Clerk to read some extracts I have marked in Alison's History of Europe.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The first effect of this state of things, as auspicious in the outset as it was perilous in the end, was a vast increase in railway speculation, and the growth of what has been not inaptly called the railway mania. It was during the years 1844, 1845, and 1846 that this system received its full development, and it was then pushed to a degree of extravagance which would not be credited by future times if not attested by a host of contemporary witnesses, and evinced by lasting effects upon the face and fortunes of the country. Compared with the fever which then seized the public mind, and the magnitude of the speculations in consequence set on foot, the famous South Sea bubble, and the corresponding furor of England, in 1824–'25, and in 1836–'37, sink into insignificance. The progressive rise in the chief articles of commerce was such as to render speculation of every kind for a considerable time a source of profit, and to diminish to an extraordinary degree the unfortunate one which terminated in bankruptcy. The result of this, as usual, was that people thought that the prosperity which had now set in would never cease; that the rise of prices, which had proved so profitable to many, would continue forever. It must be confessed that for a considerable time appearances seemed to justify the anticipation. The few fortunate speculators who set on foot some of the favorite lines soon sold their shares at such prices as in a few days enabled them to realize large fortunes. The knowledge of this so increased the public anxiety to share in these profitable investments that these shares rose higher every day, and scarcely any one who bought had not an opportunity of selling in a few days to advantage. Such was the effect of this that in a short time the nation seemed to have lost its senses.

> As the season passed on and the 30th November, the last day for lodging plans with the board of trade, approached, the pressure and excitement became unparalleled. Lithographers by hundreds were brought over from Belgium and France to aid in making the plans; the engineers and their clerks sat up all night, and several of them in two years made large fortunes. On the evening of the closing day the doors of the board of trade were besieged by a clamorous crowd contending for admission, as at the pit doors of an opera when a popular actress is to perform. Above six hundred plans were thrust in before the doors closed at midnight on the 30th November, 1845. The capital required for their construction was £270,950,000, and above £23,000,000 required to be deposited before the acts could be applied for.
> It may easily be conceived that so prodigious and universal a ferment in society did not take place without unhinging, in a great degree, the public mind, and bringing forward in the most dangerous way many of the worst qualities of human nature. The same effects on all classes which had been observed in France during the Mississippi bubble reappeared in Great Britain, but on a much greater scale, and pervading more universally all gradations of society. The passion for gain, deemed by all to be within their reach, seized upon all classes. Not a doubt was entertained, save by the thinking few who were derided as alarmists and croakers, of the possibility, nay certainty, of reaching the goal; the only point was, who was to be first in the race? All classes joined in it; country clergymen and curates hastened to invest the savings of their scanty incomes in the golden investments; traders and shop-keepers in towns almost universally expended their all in similar undertakings; servants, both in affluent and humble families, were to be seen on all sides, crowding to the agents' offices in the nearest towns, to throw their little savings into the crucible whence a golden image was expected to start forth. It was painful to behold the extent of the delusion, mournful to contemplate its certain consequences. No class, not even the very highest, was exempt from it. Ladies of rank and fashion hastened from their splendid West End mansions into the city to besiege the doors of the fortunate speculators, whose abodes were deemed a certain entrance to fabled wealth; the palaces of the exclusive were thrown open to vulgar manners and grotesque habits to facilitate an entrance to these magicians' dens.

* * * * * * * * *

It was computed that no less than £16,000,000 was expended in surveys, legislation, or litigation connected with the bills got up during the railway mania before they got through Parliament; of the £300,000,000 in round numbers which the lines were computed to cost, nearly a third has never paid anything in the shape of dividend, and on the remaining two-thirds the net receipts, after deducting the working expenses, would not on an average exceed 3 per cent.

It would be well if the historian had only to record the immediate losses which arose to the parties concerned in them from these gigantic undertakings. But, unfortunately, the evil did not stop here; but, on the contrary, has impressed its mark in a lasting way on the national character and on the estimation in which the legislature is held. From the extravagant speculations and unbounded gains and losses of the years during which the mania lasted may be dated a great change, and one materially for the worse, in the mercantile character of the country.

Mr. SMALL. There was this difference in the case of England. She had the gold in the bank vaults for the notes issued, whereas by this bill we shall receive only our own obligations for the notes. There was this other difference. England's circulation having been based on gold, when the balance of trade turned against her it drew the gold away and contracted the currency, but the damage had already been done.

Such must be the precise consequences of the passage of this bill providing for an entirely unlimited currency. Pass this bill, and you will authorize the establishment of gigantic money corporations, without power to limit their capital or control their circulation; and there will be established at the great money centers combinations under the form of law and agreeably to the provisions of this bill, which can control the entire currency of the country; can make it scarce or plenty at their pleasure; can control the highways of internal commerce; can dictate the terms of our financial policy; control our elections, and fatten on the country's distress; and they will "laugh at your calamity and mock when your fear cometh."

I read an extract from the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency:

During the past few years great corporations have been organized by authority of law, with the advantages of immense subsidies, but almost wholly without restrictions, the law-making power having been led to believe that the corporations authorized would contribute as much to the public good as to their own profit. But it has been found that overgrown corporations are conducted in defiance of the rights of the shareholders, and with little regard to the comfort, wants, and profit of the people, but chiefly for the benefit of the few officers and directors; and the whole country is now aroused to the mistaken legislation which has placed the highways of the nation under the control of a few men, without reserving such salutary restrictions as should compel the common carrier to deliver the products of the land to the m rket for a fair remuneration; and it is the great economical problem of the day how to correct a monstrous evil, which would have been under complete control if the proper restrictions had at first been provided and enforced.

If such is the result under the law as it now stands, providing for a limit to the circulation, what must happen when that limit is entirely taken away? As the Comptroller says, these banking corporations can control your railroads, dry up your canals, cripple your commerce.

I warn the East and South that this provision authorizing unlimited capital and circulation to banks, will prevent the distribution of the banking capital over their sections of the country. It will be absorbed by monster institutions in the great money centers. Prohibit any bank from holding or issuing more than $500,000 of circulating notes, and you have some chance for a share. The smaller you make the capital of the banks, the more evenly will it be distributed.

The provision in section 8 of the bill for a homeopathic resumption of specie payment has the merit of being as harmless as the five-dollar silver resumption. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall, every month after June next, issue notes to the amount of $2,000,000, payable in gold, without interest, in two years. That would furnish sufficient gold for pocket pieces for the old ladies, and would redeem the entire amount of greenbacks in eighteen years eight months and fifteen days from date.

There can be no such thing as resumption upon the atomatic theory, nor by legislative enactment. It is a financial and commercial measure, and must be reached by financial and commercial means. The road to specie payment is still long. It took England twenty-four years to travel it. It must be reached by gradual approaches. But begin your preparation now. The people have faith in gold. There is magic in its name. Such convertibility will impress upon your greenbacks in golden letters unquestioned faith. Early forced resumption means a reduction of your circulation in proportion to your gold supply. With a drain of $100,000,000 annually to pay the interest on our foreign debt, and with the balance of trade generally against us, resumption is simply impossible. First prepare the way; stop the drain; protect domestic industry; increase your productions; diminish your imports; encourage ship-building, and save the $70,000,000 paid annually to foreign ship-owners; improve the means of internal transportation and let the markets of the world be open to your produce; legislate not as if you were in bankruptcy; but develop your resources, and specie payments will come as naturally as do the winds and the tides.

In the mean time let us have no more expansion than the $44,000,000 reserve will give us. That, having largely gone into the pockets of the people, cannot be withdrawn; and let us have no contraction. Let credit be maintained and fostered; let prices be steady; and let all remember, in the language of Mr. Webster that—

Credit is the vital air of modern commerce. It has done more, a thousand times to enrich nations than all the mines of all the world. It has excited labor, stimulated manufactures, pushed commerce over every sea, and brought every nation, every kingdom, and every small tribe among the races of men, to be known to all the rest. It has raised armies, equipped navies, and, triumphing over the gross power of mere numbers, it has established national supremacy on the foundation of intelligence, wealth, and well-directed industry.

What is gold? In and of itself it is the most worthless of all the metals. What is your paper currency? Except in so far as it is used in promoting industry, it is a shadow—a myth. What are your water-powers, your railroads, your untold millions of acres of productive land? Dead and useless matter, until touched by the magic hand of industry, when all springs to life.

Mr. Speaker, write upon all the approaches to your Capitol, in letters broad and plain, that labor—well-directed labor—is the only source of a nation's wealth; and then let the sentiment find a reflex in the laws you enact, and your finances will become sound and healthy. Then we shall again see our people all alive and stirring, pushing on their fortunes and bettering their conditions, and at the same time filling to overflowing the measure of the general prosperity. And then "we shall again see that credit which reaches out its hand to honest enterprise; that certainty of reward which cheers on labor to the utmost stretch of its sinews; that personal and individual independence which enables every man to say that no man is his master."

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the time of the House for a few minutes in discussing briefly the relation and duties of the General Government to a portion, at least, of the producing interests of the Mississippi Valley.

I do not regard this question as sectional in any sense of the word. We of that valley rejoice and gladly assist in everything that tends to advance the material interests or aid in the development of the resources of any portion of the country.

Our people have no sectional prejudices. There is not a State east of the Alleghanies but has sent of her bravest sons and fairest daughters to make for themselves homes and gather to themselves wealth and comfort and happiness on our flower-strewn prairies or mid the giant growth of our rolling timber lands. There is not a State or Territory in the far West but numbers among the noblest specimens of her manhood those who turn with a longing heart to some spot in this grand valley, where are the homes of their childhood and the graves of their loved ones. No; bound by strong ties of affection and kinship to the East and West alike, the Mississippi Valley could not be sectional in her thoughts if she would; and stimulated as she is by a warm love of our whole country, and an abiding faith in the grandeur of its destiny, she would not be sectional if she could.

Therefore, in coming before this body and presenting her claims to consideration, she does so feeling that she is asking only that which will redound to the benefit of the whole people. She comes into this House in this spirit, and asks of the fathers and elder brothers of the East, and of the younger brothers and sons of the West, believing that she will receive a careful hearing and favorable consideration of her claims. And should it become necessary to refer to some of the legislation of the past in presenting these claims, it will be done in no spirit of fault-finding, but simply in the endeavor to present proper exhibits and contrasts.

From the extent of our territory, the richness of our soil, the untold amount of our mineral resources, the variety of our productions, in short, the unmeasured abundance of all that goes to make up a nation's wealth, and which this people must sooner or later depend upon to maintain its position among nations, ay, upon which it must depend for its life itself, we feel it to be the duty of this Government, as one of the surest and most effective means of guarding the interests of the whole nation, to look well to the necessities of this valley.

The great need, the immediate and pressing need, of the present is such improvement of our water lines of transit as will enable our producers to sell and your consumers to buy at living rates; that our farmers, as they toil early and late, in tempest and sunshine, may feel that there is at least a reasonable prospect that the fruit of the long hours of their labor may not be "as Dead Sea fruit upon their lips."

We desire that the operatives in your factories, in saving a few dollars from their wages, shall be sustained by the knowledge that our produce will be brought to their doors at such prices that they may buy, and eat, and live. We desire such rates of transportation that your skilled laborers in your cities may be able to support themselves and families and yet lay up something for the dark day when there may be no work; so that the nation may not see, as it has seen, the terrible sight, nor hear, as it has heard, the fearful words of thousands of laboring men parading your streets without work, without money, without bread, demanding bread at the hands of the city that their wives and little ones might not perish of starvation. We desire such rates of transportation to the sea-board as will enable us to place a sufficient portion of our surplus produce in European markets, to meet the interest on your national indebtedness held there. For, rest assured, sir, the great and growing Mississippi Valley is able with her surplus produce to pay every cent of your interest abroad as rapidly as it matures, if you will but help her to get her produce to salt water. We know it is within the constitutional power, and believe it to be the duty of the General Government to assist more effectively than it has ever done in this matter.

But how shall western producers reach eastern and foreign consumers? This is one of the great problems of this age. It is one in which all parts of the country are vitally interested; for I cannot conceive, sir, that any gentleman on this floor will care to admit that his views are so limited, his patriotism so prescribed, or his sense of duty so warped by local influences that he feels no interest in these matters.

The Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries furnish direct means of transit for the produce of one-half of the States of this Union. Eleven of these, pre-eminently the grain-producing States of the Union, embrace an area of over one million square miles. There are under actual cultivation in grain in these eleven States at present over forty million acres of land, producing more than 1,000,000,000 bushels of grain annually. Of this amount more than 300,000,000 bushels, over 8,000,000 tons, is surplus. It would require 40,000 railroad trains of 20 cars each, annually, or 125 trains moving out every working-day in the year for the whole year, to transport this surplus grain East. Gentlemen can estimate the amount of rolling-stock necessary to accomplish this work. Add to this the local freights, live-stock, cotton, and all other produce besides grain—for I have been speaking only of grain—and gentlemen can see that railroads alone cannot accomplish the work.

Why, sir, there were received into Chicago alone, during the year 1872, near seven hundred thousand head of cattle and three and a half million head of hogs, nearly all of which were again shipped thence, either on foot or dressed and cured. Fortunately for us and for all, we have, during a portion of the year at least, water transportation by means of the lakes; but unfortunately for all, at the very period when transportation is most needed, winter lays his icy hands upon the lakes, and navigation ceases.

What, then, must the western producer do? The railroads cannot accomplish the required work, although they may reap a golden harvest in what they do accomplish. According to the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for January, 1874, the average price of corn in Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana, on the 31st day of December, 1873, was 33 cents per bushel, and at the same time it averaged 90 cents per bushel in the New England States. As shown by the same report, while wheat averaged 90 cents per bushel in Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska, it averaged $1.75 per bushel in the six New England States; and in the Southern States, on the Atlantic coast, it averaged about the same, reaching, however, $2.25 per bushel in South Carolina.

Such is the result of our present system of transportation; and from such exactions as these the producing and consuming interests are mutually suffering terrible blows; while this question that will not down at your bidding, this question that is asked with bated breath and blanched cheek in thousands of households—this question of bread, stands face to face with this Congress. It may find its solution in the great natural highways of our country. And the equally vexed question of when and how to resume specie payment may here also find its solution. For so long as we must send our gold abroad to meet the interest on our indebtedness it would seem to be futile to talk of specie payment.

For the ten years ending December 31, 1872, we had exported in coin and bullion $526,000,000 more than we imported. We cannot send our gold to Europe to pay the interest on our debts and keep it at home to redeem our greenbacks at the same time. But so soon as we can make our surplus produce pay this interest we can keep our gold at home, and are near the solution of this financial problem.

We can produce that surplus. What we need, and what the interest of the whole nation demands, is that this surplus may be placed in market as cheaply as possible. This can only be done by improving our water-lines so that they can be used without constant danger of snags, and rocks, and sand-bars, and consequent high insurance and loss of property.

Sir, gentlemen who do not travel our western waters have but faint ideas of how prodigal nature has been with her favors and how negligent the nation has been in preserving these advantages. With such advantages as the world never saw, we have been so negligent that in places where there have been, and should be now, good navigable channels, there is but little better than a swamp, full of snags and sand-bars, and wrecks of noble steamers.

Why, sir, the loss of steamboat property, including cargoes, on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, during the year 1873, that might have been prevented if sufficient appropriations had been made to clear the channels and protect the harbors, was over $1,000,000. This does not include losses by fire or explosion of boilers, but simply losses of the character indicated. Nor, sir, does it include the losses of smaller amounts, felt only in a neighborhood.

Let me illustrate. A couple of my constitutents, Messrs. Chapman & Hess, a few months since loaded a barge with staves for New Orleans. She was placed in charge of an efficient pilot, but time and again she struck and stuck on sand-bars, and had to be pulled off by steam-vessels at heavy cost; so that when she arrived in New Orleans, although the cargo sold for enough to have cleared some two or three thousand dollars, the expense of the trip had been so great the gentlemen lacked a few dollars of coming out even.

This is a small sum, it is true, sir, for gentlemen who legislate about millions, and yet it is just such transactions as this, that by their success or failure stimulate or destroy the industries of every neighborhood and village in the land. And when you remember that this is but one case in thousands, of which we never hear, that are constantly happening on our western waters, you may form some idea of the immense sum that is being placed to the debit side of the ledger in the account that the people of the Mississippi Valley have a right to keep and are keeping with this Government.

May I relate another incident? A few months since, in coming down the Ohio River, a gentleman on the steamer informed me that a short time previous he was passing over the Grand Chain, a rocky shallow on the Ohio, near its mouth. He was conversing with the pilot. The night was dark; the shore could not be seen. The boat was moving very slowly—feeling her way. The pilot became restless and uneasy, and ceased talking. Suddenly, however, the barking of a dog was heard far away on the shore. "There," said the pilot, brightening up, and quickly giving the wheel two or three turns, "I'm all right. I've steered by the barking of that dog every night I've passed here for five years." The cackling of geese saved Rome; and the barking of a dog told this pilot just where he was and what direction to head his boat to avoid the rocks. And this dog was the only substitute for beacon-light or buoy that existed to show the faithful pilot how to direct his course to save his valuable cargo and still more valuable lives. A few weeks after this conversation the Probasco, one of our finest steamers, struck on these same rocks, sank, and vessel and cargo were lost. And yet, sir, the Government has spent, and rightly, too, $800,000 to remove the rocks from Hell Gate and East River, New York, while not one cent has ever been spent to remove the rocks or deepen the channel of the Grand Chain, over which float hundreds of millions of commerce annually. And so, while the Government with generous hand, in almost untold quantities, is expending money for lights and buoys and improvements along the Atlantic coast, one faithful watchdog, standing guard over his master's cabin, sends out into the midnight darkness his challenge to the passing steamer all aglow with light and freighted with precious lives. And the pilot, thus notified of his exact locality, steers his floating palace safely past rocks and shoals into deep water below. Hundreds of thousands of dollars for New York Harbor—a settler's dog for the Ohio River. Sir, is this justice? And yet, sir, it is under exactly such disadvantages as these that our western commerce, a commerce in which the whole nation is interested, is laboring to-day.

I am aware, sir, that these western rivers have not been without assistance from the General Government. But I do claim that this assistance has been inadequate and out of all proportion to that of other sections of the country. Not that I would complain that this has been too great, but that ours has been too small.

Let us examine the figures a little while. From the 30th day of June, 1865, to the 30th day of June, 1873, there was expended, in round numbers, for light-houses and kindred purposes on the Atlantic coast $4,000,000; for the improvement of rivers and harbors of the Atlantic coast $11,000,000; making a total of $15,000,000 for sixteen States. For the same time there was expended on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, embracing navigable waters in Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, and Kentucky, $5,400,000. And of this amount over $3,000,000 has been expended on the Des Moines Rapids, and Louisville Canal, (and it was greatly needed in both places,) leaving but a little over $2,000,000 in eight years for the navigable waters of eighteen of the largest and most prosperous States of the Union.

Why this discrimination? The dangers and necessities of commerce cannot explain it.

On the Mississippi River and its tributaries for the four years 1868, 1869, 1870, and 1871, the number of steamers lost by wrecking and sinking, not including those lost by fire, collision, or explosion, is 180. The number lost in the same way during the same time on the Atlantic coast, including bays and rivers, was 15. And yet, sir, I find on examination that there are in round numbers 1,000 steamers on our western waters and 1,700 on the Atlantic coast. So that the dangers of navigation will stand about thus: of 1,000 vessels 180 are lost; of 1,700 vessels 15 are lost.

Let it be remembered that I am speaking only of the class of dangers that could be greatly mitigated or entirely removed by legislative action.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the record—our western waters losing, from wrecking and sinking, on rocks and snags, and kindred impediments and hinderances to navigation that for the most part might have been removed, twelve times as many steamers, out of one thousand, as the Atlantic coast, including rivers, harbors, bays, and ocean, has lost, out of nearly double the number. Could the absolute dangers of navigation be more strikingly presented? And yet, sir, this section has received five dollars to our one to improve its navigation and protect its commerce.

I am not here, sir, to complain of this money being expended on this side of the mountains. I have no doubt it was all judiciously expended, and was necessary. But, sir, is it strange that when I return to my district and travel along its southern border for a hundred miles down the beautiful Ohio, and another hundred along its western borders, up the Mississippi, and am scarcely ever out of sight of the wrecks of noble steamers—is it strange that I should think of this contrast? And as the captain, pointing to wreck after wreck, informs me that this vessel was loaded with corn, and that with wheat, the one up yonder with live-stock, and the one down yonder with other farm products; and when I remember that these are all gone, lost, swallowed up by the seething waters because my country has not done its full duty, shall I be astonished that the agricultural interests of this grand valley are waning?

These men are not communists. They are not wild visionaries. They are men who feel that something must be done that their labor may not come to naught, and who see in the improvement of these great water-lines hope for themselves and good for the whole nation. They fully understand, as we all do, that this is not the work of a day; but they also know, as every thinking man knows, that it is poor economy to put $500 where $5,000 are absolutely needed.

True economy demands that money enough be appropriated to accomplish something definite and permanent, whenever it is used, else the money is simply wasted. And until something of this kind can be effected, let buoys and lights be arranged, wherever it can be done, to mark the more dangerous wrecks, rocks, and snags.

Why, sir, the Atlantic coast is absolutely picketed with beacon-lights, warning the storm-worn mariner of rocks and shoals and reefs and danger and death; while our western waters, wending their way for thousands and thousands of miles, dangerous with hidden rocks and treacherous quicksands and sunken wrecks, show nowhere in all their length a single light or buoy to warn the pilot of danger. Cannot this be changed? Might not two or three buoys and lights be arranged along the channel over the Grand Chain? Might not the Government afford to buoy the six rocks that lie right in the channel at Cairo, over or around which must pass the four thousand steamers landing there every year? Nothing has yet been expended thus; and yet Cairo yields some $20,000 per year as revenue to the Government.

While upon this point, I desire to say that there seems to exist in Congress a strange want of information in regard to the revenue derived from customs dues on our western waters. On the 29th day of last month, in a colloquy on this floor with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] whose interest in all that tends to promote the material advancement of the country I have no reason to doubt, used these words:

> Not one of the ports of the Mississippi or its tributaries above New Orleans pays into the Treasury one dollar of revenue.

If such has been the information of the Congress of the United States in the past, I beg to undeceive it now. There are over twenty districts for collecting customs on the Mississippi and its tributaries each of which pays a revenue to the Government varying from a few hundred to over a million dollars annually.

Why, sir, the customs receipts of Saint Louis alone for the last fiscal year were more than three times as much as the whole of Michigan collected, with its lakes and rivers and harbors. The Mississippi Valley will gladly take the money its commerce pays into the Treasury of the United States, expend it in improving its navigation, and ask not one cent beside from the Government as an appropriation. Why not do this, if gentlemen believe that our customs districts are a source of expense, and the appropriations we ask mere bounties at the hands of the Government?

Sir, the receipts from customs on the Mississippi and its tributaries paid into the Treasury of the United States for the last fiscal year were over $3,000,000 in excess of what was drawn out, including appropriations. So that these rivers have not, up to this time, been a source of expense to the Government.

I am not unmindful, sir, of the general disposition toward retrenchment. I am not unmindful of the desire and intention, so often expressed on this floor, to reduce all appropriations to the lowest possible figures consistent with prudence; and I recognize in the reports of the Committee on Appropriations, and the steady voting of the majority in this House, a fixed determination to make such reductions.

Sir, I rejoice to see this evidence of the prevalence of this spirit. Nor would I say or do aught to influence the vote of any member against the most rigid economy. But, sir, realizing as I do, and as I believe every gentleman on this floor does, the necessity that a larger proportion of the surplus produce of this country should reach foreign markets; seeing, as I have endeavored to show, that the only possible outlet for a large portion of this produce is by the Mississippi River and its tributaries where the dangers are so great, is it asking too much of this House that, when the river and harbor appropriation bill comes to be reported it shall show the largest appropriations where the figures show the greatest dangers to exist? This is all that we ask. Let the appropriations be apportioned in accordance with the necessities in each case.

It may be this has not been necessary in the past; but certain it is that one of the imperative demands of the present is that we shall do something thorough and effective in improving our water-routes to the sea, and do it promptly. If this is done, the whole nation shall reap the benefit; if it is not done, the blow will not fall upon the Mississippi Valley alone, but its paralyzing effects must be felt and borne by all, and this Congress will be held responsible at the bar of public opinion. The right to act exists, the duty to act exists, and the nation demands action. Will we exercise that right, will we perform that duty, will we meet the demands of the nation?

[Mr. CROSSLAND addressed the House on the subject of finance. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

FINANCE AND ECONOMY.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, no question is receiving so much rugged thought in this nation to-day as the question of finance; and well may it be so, as no other question is so vital to all the material interests of the country, and it thus becomes each individual to investigate and form his judgment.

Why this universal thought and anxiety, Mr. Speaker?

The fact that there is so much concern in the public mind brings back to our memories the recent past with its financial convulsion, and indicates a dread of the future. Until recently the public mind was undisturbed on this question, and was busied with the varied avocations in life, as pursued in this country.

Gradually men became conscious that, by absorption in new enterprises and by actual loss and destruction and other causes, the volume of currency was insufficient, and a stringency was setting in. Thoughtful men were disturbed by the report of a failure here and another there, until the alarm became general, and then, unheralded, and to great extent by surprise, the panic fell upon the entire land. Causeless and senseless this panic may have been; yet it was real, dreadful, and disastrous. Suddenly the currency disappeared; and it was found that the finances of the people were in the hands of stock-jobbers and gamblers who levied their contributions and "called" the "shorts" without mercy.

Wise metallic doctors of finance who had been proclaiming their dogmas could not relieve us, because of the inadequate quantity of specie, and their hard-money theories were ingloriously exploded. There was no help; the currency was cornered.

Every government owes it to its people to provide them with a good, safe, and uniform currency in sufficient quantity, without which no nation can have general or abiding prosperity. If one medium of exchange is not possessed in sufficient quantity and quality another must be sought and adopted.

The several States and the people, at the establishment of this Government, wisely delegated to Congress the power to coin money and regulate its value. The exercise of this power becomes a duty not to be omitted or misused.

The power to coin money is not limited to impressing the national emblem upon the precious metals, but includes also the power to stamp its promise and faith upon paper and make it money, and then regulate its value, and make it a fixed and uniform standard throughout the land. And it follows as of course that a sufficient volume should be so provided, and for Congress to fail in this regard would be, to say the least, and say it mildly, to fail to do its whole duty.

It was never intended by the fathers that the States should coin money, or stamp paper to circulate as money, or to fix its value, and never ought to have been permitted, State rights to the contrary notwithstanding. Much less should the Government ever have permitted banks, corporations, or individuals to stamp and issue money.

In the right to issue a circulating medium, as in some other things, State rights and individual rights should be postponed to the public good.

We might as well permit private individuals to establish courts and peddle cheap justice, or to carry the mails and set up private post-offices.

The currency ought not to be local and uncertain; but, on the contrary, it is vitally essential that it should be national and uniform. This the people have a right to demand, and Congress cannot if it would, and ought not if it could, escape this responsibility.

We are told that the precious metals are to be coined, which becomes not only a national currency, but also the currency of the world. But Mr. Speaker, we all know, without stopping to give amounts and figures, that all our coin and precious metals would make a currency for a very small world.

It does seem incredible that any party or any number of individuals should propose to reduce the money circulation of this country to the amount attainable in the precious metals, when we know it is inadequate. We cannot endure a reduction of the currency to that level. Contraction is monopoly of the most alarming proportions. Some other medium must be sought and used, and there is none better than the national credit; and of this we are provided with an abundant measure.

The last ten or twelve years are replete with lessons in finance it would be wise to carefully study—lessons taught by necessity and demonstrated by financial prosperity.

Before that period the Government had not to any extent stamped paper and issued it as money.

These hard-money philosophers had high places in the dominant party. They had often carried important elections by holding aloft open-work purses through which glittered the golden eagles, and jingled most eloquently silver dollars to the gaping crowd. They might perhaps have attained equal success by beating Chinese gongs. While professing hard money they flooded the land everywhere by about the softest currency that ever perplexed or cursed any people. They applied their shin-plasters, their blisters, and bleeders, without mercy, and no State suffered more than my own by this policy.

But, Mr. Speaker, the greenback was our deliverance. And had I my way I would stamp upon it, not only in green, but in all of the seven colors, the emblem of the rainbow, in token that our land shall not again be deluged with these petty bank bills.

It is probable that this State and local currency was a necessity—Congress having failed to provide a national currency sufficient for the requirements of the country. Some medium of exchange must be had, and so it would be again if Congress shall fail to provide at all times a remedy. It was thought that the policy of the country was fixed as to these measures.

But we find, as time moves on, the advocates of this same old policy are again on the alert, and striving to proselyte and indoctrinate the people with these same old dogmas. If we propose a slight increase of the greenback currency, they lustily cry "inflation," and stigmatize it as an irredeemable paper currency, which may end in repudiation I presume they mean to intimate. They are unhappy and restive, and want to return to specie payment, and wisely and ponderously proclaim that they want to go back to, and rest upon, the permanent and reliable gold and silver basis currency of the world. They draw out their fine-spun theories in golden threads, and play upon this hard-money "harp of a thousand strings" as seductively as in days of "auld lang-syne."

What do these gentlemen want? it becomes us to inquire. Do they want those greenbacks out of the way under the pretense of a specie basis, in order to make room for this same vile trash before mentioned? When they accomplish this, it may then be truly said that "a stranger takes a kinsman's place." Greenbacks are legitimate relatives of the Government; local paper money a stranger and a bastard currency. Already this strange tribe of the shin-plaster family begins to appear, as shown in some specimens the other day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this Hall. These are the kittens that are soon to become wild cats of the future.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of individuals and corporations now ding-donging the country for contraction and resumption of specie payments, who are ready with printing-press and pen in hand to prepare and send afloat this old-time local paper currency which we thought was forever dead.

Mr. Speaker, the genial and able gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] the other day, in his remarks upon this question, stated, in substance, that before the war his State had an excellent banking system. To some of his people it might have so appeared, but he could not get the unanimous testimony of the people of my State, or of the West, to that effect; and certainly not as to the banking system of some of his neighboring States.

The dead carcasses of Rhode Island Central wild-cat bills are still to be found in almost every western home. Our people took this money, as it was the best they could get, and gave their produce for it. The promise to redeem the money was not made good, and somebody in the East has the fruit of our labor for nothing.

A little further on in his remarks—and I mention it in no spirit of unkindness to him—this same gentleman said in substance that the Government had compelled them to dispense with their own very profitable banking system, which they had enjoyed before the war, and to accept instead national banks; and said that Illinois and other Western States ought not to complain, as they did, for not possessing an equal amount of the national banking capital, per capita, and said further that Illinois was too poor to take and keep all that was allotted to her.

It seemed to me he might have been a little more magnanimous and forborne to thus twit us with our poverty. His people had loaned us their local paper money at 10 per cent. interest and a large bonus besides, and then finally repudiated their own money they had loaned us; and thus swallowed the interest, the bonus, and the principal also. We in the West are laid under enormous tribute to his people in the adjustment of the revenue. All this we have borne and paid with but little murmur.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman how long he thinks it would take us in the West, under his system of banking and protection, to own as much capital as he can truthfully boast of having in his enterprising State?

We really never did prosper until disinthralled from this pernicious system of local currency which, for the most part, had its home, if home it ever had, in certain localities in the East.

In ten years, under greenback influence, the mere increase of population of the State of Illinois exceeds the entire population of the gentleman's State, with two or three more of its neighboring States thrown in.

The necessities of the Government compelled Congress to suppress the old system of banking, and to provide a good currency in sufficient volume for the wants of our busy, ambitious, and enterprising people, and I have given you the results.

There may have been other stimulating causes for this marvelous advance, yet for the most part it was the sound-currency spring, that pervaded all enterprise and employed and paid labor. Actual experience keeps a good, safe school, and we certainly ought to have sufficient capacity to learn by such tuition.

To appease this everlasting clamor for contraction we may have ventured too near the verge. But let us be deceived no more. Combined parties in the last national canvass had virtually declared in favor of contraction. A distinguished gentleman, who had taught political economy, and had said and written much on finance, by some miraculous conversion made a hard-money bid for the Presidency; but the prize was not knocked down by the people at that bid. Contraction was virtually condemned and overwhelmed at the polls, and a gradual-expansion policy ought to have followed this verdict. Without a sufficient volume of national currency money kings, enthroned in Wall street, can manipulate the finances and produce a stringency, and then a panic and wide-spread disaster at pleasure.

When money is limited these remorseless monarchs can corner the currency at will, and there is no power to stay their hands or reverse their decrees. All that has recently happened may be repeated again, unless the wisdom of Congress makes it impossible. These same rings of stock-gamblers would have produced the same disaster before were it not that the volume then exceeded the means under their control.

But we are told, Mr. Speaker, that when money is abundant men will run wild in speculation. This may be true, and an evil. But, sir, in fact, do not contraction and stringency make stupendous speculation possible? Then it is that it takes advantage of necessity. Then it is that capital demands its usury; and then it is that capital scalps the unfortunate and starves the poor; and then it is, as is timely suggested to me by my distinguished friend at my side, that the rich grow richer and the poor grow poorer. Then it is that we are dragged into the merciless courts of bankruptcy, and a heartless creditor administers upon our estate while we yet live. When adequate money circulation ceases, the hand of labor ceases to move, as when the blood of the natural body ceases to circulate and the once provident head of the family is as powerless as if actually dead. Money is as essential to the support of his family as is the blood in his veins. With it he can fight the wolf of hunger from the door and save his little ones. Without it he is as powerless as a lamb led to the slaughter.

The volume of money in circulation should, as near as may be, equal the current exchange of commodities and the current wages of labor. But, say they, what matters it if values do shrink 100 per cent. if a dollar will then have double the purchasing power it now has? Why, sir, if we were all out of debt, national, State, municipal, and individual, it would not make so much difference. But we are not out of debt. The East and their banks, insurance companies and corporations, and wealthy individuals hold our notes and bonds from the West to the amount of millions of dollars, contracted, too, at above the present level of values. Contract as is proposed, and you in fact increase our debt in like proportion. You double the mortgages upon us and diminish our power to pay.

The increase of population and expansion of the country demand a gradual increase of the national currency; and let it be greenbacks, simple and pure, and like what we have. And to prevent a recurrence of panics let at least $200,000,000 of national bonds, bearing so low a rate of interest, payable in currency, that they would not go abroad, be issued, which bonds should be convertible into currency at the option of the holder, as proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] or some similar measure to this.

But it is said that these bonds would be hoarded. All right; God grant that they may be hoarded. We will then issue more of the same sort, and keep on until their place is supplied. Would it not be as well for us if our own people should take and hoard our 3 per cent. bonds as it now is for foreign bankers and capitalists to hoard our 6 per cent. bonds, payable in gold? I care not how much of our national debt our own people may be induced to hold; the more the better. That would stop in a measure the drain of gold from this country, and would soon so reduce the demand for coin that it would drop to a level with greenbacks. We could then indeed resume specie payment, so much to be desired.

The fact that greenbacks are below gold in value is not at all due to any want of confidence on the part of our people in the good faith and ultimate ability of our Government to redeem them.

The happy gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] told us the other day about the hatfuls of the old continental money that were presented to him, as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, for redemption, a great many years ago, when he came to Congress from some other State, which money he in substance said had made two generations happy; one generation was made happy in its issue, use, and profit, and another generation made happy that they did not have to redeem it; and went on to illustrate by showing that we are now made happy in the issue and use of the greenback, and, as I understood him to intimate, that another generation would some day be made happy in its repudiation, not having it to pay.

Yes, sir; if the greenback currency is ever repudiated it will be done by some other generation, and when some other and different councils sit in these Halls. He nor I will see that happy day; we shall have gone to other shores long ere that time arrives.

Some propose an increase of national banks, and others free banking; but good reasons for these measures are not known to myself.

A national-bank note is no better than a greenback, and the only value or currency it attains is founded upon the Government bond that is placed behind it for security and pledge of its redemption. If any increase of currency in this way, why go to the trouble of requiring the organization of a bank? Why not let the Treasurer of the United States receive the bonds as security from private parties, and deliver greenbacks dollar for dollar? This would be cheaper and simpler. And why not do what is still better—issue the greenbacks, take up and cancel the bonds, and save the interest on them to the amount of millions of dollars.

It was a wise measure in Mr. Lincoln's administration to organize these national banks. By that means the country got rid of the local banks, of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] as well as other like institutions. I admit the national banks are the best banks we ever had, and we ought never to permit any other; but, sir, I cannot see that more of such as we have are required. Having them we patronize them and use and operate them, and it is all right to do so. As the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] showed, my State is not anxious for more, as she has never used up all of the capital that was allotted to her. I know of no one of my people who is personally interested in any national bank, as owner or patron, who would not cheerfully yield it up if the public good requires it. Allow them to do a simple exchange business and they would willingly consent to return their circulation if it was deemed best to do so.

I believe the good of our people requires a gradual increase of the national currency; and, sir, the temper of this Congress since it has been in session, as evinced by its action and vote, has been of immense value to the people of the West. When contraction found that it could not carry this House for further reduction, the currency began to circulate more freely. The business revived, and people felt relieved, and the prices of produce advanced. And when the Administration began to put out, as it did, the reserve of forty-four millions, the spell was indeed broken, and prices advanced; and so by the action of the Administration and the evident temper of this Congress millions have been given to the people of my State alone, and the same proportion of profit has gone to other localities in the West, and I have no doubt that the South, East, and the entire country were in like manner benefited.

Gentlemen on the other side of this House politically have denounced the Secretary of the Treasury for this illegal act, as they called it, and characterized it as usurpation of power and subversive of liberty, and such other clap-trap denunciation. But, sir, I, in the name of the people whom I have the honor to represent, tender their thanks to this Administration for the relief rendered in this emergency.

And this only proves the proposition that more money is the remedy demanded.

Mr. Speaker, while demanding a reasonable increase of the volume of national currency, economy is not to be forgotten. Abundant money without economy is dangerous and evil. The two questions cannot be well separated.

Holding to the strictest practical economy here as elsewhere, national and individual, I will only say that on this limited occasion I would not mention this indispensable rule of good government were it not for the remarkable language that fell the day before yesterday from the lips of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] not now in his seat, having just left it, as I am sorry to see. All he said about economy I indorse and heartily approve, and thank him for presenting to the House in such a forcible manner.

When he rose to speak upon the bill before the House for the reduction of taxes, I, being a new member, did not know what was coming. I observed, however, that the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] a colleague on the leading committee of this House, immediately rose also and blandly moved that the gentleman in his remarks should not be confined to the parliamentary rules of debate, in discussing the question before the House, but that he might be allowed to ramble at will, which, of course, was granted. Other members around me, more experienced, hinted at what might be expected.

And the able gentleman went on in a very courteous manner to lecture this Congress for more than two hours, not so much as to what we should do, as what other Congresses, for the past twelve to twenty, fifty, and a hundred years had done, and what they had not done. He complains of useless expenditures, and arrays a long list of established ports of entry which collect no revenue, and many more which do not collect enough to pay the salaries of their respective officers. What Congress established these ports of entry he forgot to tell us; but certain it is they were not established by this Congress. They were not established by the present Administration. On examination, I find many of them were established before I was born, and some of them forty years before that time. Others of them were established under the administrations of Andrew Jackson, Van Buren, Polk, Pierce, and Buchanan; and nearly all of them have existed just as they now do ever since the honorable gentleman has been a member of Congress.

Now I say, and say it in all and full respect to the honorable gentleman who is, by his long-continued service here, the father of this House, that I do not object to being scolded and even abused about anything I do or fail to do; but I did smart and feel restive at being so unmercifully scolded, in such dolorous tones, for and about things with which I never had anything to do whatever. I could not apply the contents of the anonymous letter he caused to be read at the desk. I had heard a similar letter read from the stump in the last campaign. It may have been the same one. A large majority of this Congress are new members, who were never here before. We never have had an opportunity to bring in and propose reforms; and, in fact, have no power here now to do so. All we can do is to vote.

Mr. Speaker, I do not complain of the gentleman's sharp speech. I hope it will do some good; but I wish to protest here that it does not apply to myself, nor does it, I think, apply to half of the members of this House. It may apply to some of the older members of the House; and such as it applies to I hope will heed its wise and wholesome counsels, and whoever the coat fits let him put it on.

Mr. Speaker, let some experienced member of some of the important committees of this House propose action and declare war on the abuses he mentioned, and I will enlist as a private in the crusade.

Mr. Speaker, scolding is all well enough; advice is better; but neither ever won a victory.

Whoever would lead in a fight must take the advance and say, "Come on!" This at least is the better way to command raw recruits. Old and experienced members of either side of this House politically can get the floor to strike a blow whenever they desire. Not so with us. The Speaker's eye can never see any of us when one of them is on his feet.

Why were not bills presented long ago to abolish these useless and expensive ports of entry, and muster their indolent officers out of the service? I will vote for such bills, and so will two hundred more members here.

Of whom does he complain? The Secretary of the Treasury could change no law. The President could repeal no act of Congress establishing these ports. He is not to blame. I do not speak from any authority, but I pledge him that if Congress will pass an act to abolish these ports and cut off these useless expenditures, the President will approve it and execute the law.

Mr. Speaker, it would have been competent for any Congress for the last fifteen years to have abolished the ports of entry mentioned. It would have been especially fitting for the leading committee of this House, whose chairman has a clerk furnished him, to have prepared and brought in a bill for such purpose at any time before the gentleman began his discourse. Had this been done by somebody a few years ago, it would have saved the anonymous gentleman the trouble of writing letters for campaign purposes—to be afterward read in Congress with his worthless name suppressed, as it was done.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, had any distinguished member of Congress, of either party, democrat or republican, during his long and honorable service here, (and some of them have served here almost ever since when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary,) proposed this reform to the service, and procured the passage of an act to close these useless ports, that member, whether democrat or republican, would be entitled to all honor for his distinguished services.

But, Mr. Speaker, what is indeed wonderful, no such member ever took the trouble to draw such a bill and present it. At least, I am told the record does not show the history of any such valuable service as to arise and propose the same. Yes, Mr. Speaker, these enormities, stranger still, have escaped the notice of the author of the civil-service rules for reform. I say to the gentleman, in all kindness and sincerity, that I will enlist under him, or any other gentleman on either side of this House, in a crusade against any of these abuses, but it must be understood that I want a fight, a little blood-letting in some vital place. And I will also say to him, and to the distinguished gentleman from New York, representing the Empire City, on the other side of the House, that when Boston and New York come in with their appropriation bills for those enormous custom-houses and post-offices which he mentioned, let them only sound their bugles and lead off. I will follow; and so will other new members, in my judgment; nor will older members hold back.

Economy is a good deal like charity; the best place in the world to commence it is at home. Let us put ourselves to the test, and see who is in earnest. Don't let us try to blister somebody else if, as others see us, we have a spot that needs one so much ourselves.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit me a single word of explanation?

Mr. FORT. Certainly. But, of course, I had no intention to stick a blister on you.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In the year 1870 I introduced into this House a bill to abolish all pension agencies, and to pay the money to the pensioners directly from Washington through the post-office. I advocated that bill on this floor——

Mr. FORT. Look here! You are stealing some of my thunder. I was coming to the pension business. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I could not get more than twenty-two votes for it, although it was drawn by a gentleman much more capable of drawing such a bill than myself; and among them was not the vote of my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. FORT. I did not presume that I was hurling a shaft at my distinguished friend, [Mr. BUTLER.]

It did seem to me that the gentleman had in his mind's eye the Congresses that sat in these Halls fifty years ago, but most likely within the last twelve or fifteen years; and was really not intending what he said for any one who was here now, except to apprise us of the failings of our predecessors and to admonish us of their errors.

Mr. Speaker, I will only add that I will not consent, as one of the new members, to be charged with the blunders of Congress of the last seventy years, and all the omissions of the members thereof; nor with the stupendous blunders of half a dozen administrations which never even in their day had my support.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman also paraded another useless expenditure and extravagance before this Congress in the person of fat pension agents. I most heartily agree with him that these over-fed officers ought to be put on half-rations awhile. And here again the wonder is why it came to be so. The able and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] ever on the alert, has just told us here that he did, in 1870, propose a reform and a vast reduction of expenditure, besides making it vastly more convenient for the poor, invalid, crippled soldiers, of whose convenience he seems to have been mindful by providing that pensions should be paid through the mails by the postmasters. I am sorry his bill did not pass; had I been here I would certainly have voted for it. Why it did not receive the support of the distinguished gentleman who now sees and reports to us the extravagances of the pension service is not explained.

Mr. Speaker, I am heartily glad the gentleman brought up this matter of the payment of pensions, and I agree that there ought to be a reform—not by way of any complaint against any pension agent or officer, for I know nothing about their question of pay or work. I am for action; and am in favor of transferring all matters pertaining to pensions, and the payment of pensions, to the War Department where it naturally belongs. There are plenty of Army officers now unemployed, as the complaint is, to adjust the claims and settle with every pensioner in the land; and it can be done with dispatch and regularity and cheapness through the post-office, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has suggested, and thus we will save these enormous salaries paid to pension agents mentioned by the gentleman.

And again let us go further in the road to economy, and at once transfer all the Indian affairs and Indian agencies to the Army. There are, we are told, plenty of unemployed officers, who are able, capable, and reliable, to attend to all the Indian affairs, and thus save the enormous expense of Indian agents, commissioners, and their attendant and enormous retinue of employés and retainers, and by this we could save millions annually.

The Interior Department as now organized is a monstrous incongruity. I have no complaint to make of this Department or its administration. If there be fault anywhere, it is in Congress. I agree with the gentleman that matters might be amended, but the power to apply the remedy is in Congress, where it has all this time rested unused.

The gentleman mentioned matters connected with the Treasury Department; also which Department, as I understand it, is to some extent under his own supervision, so far at least as this House is concerned. Why not make a move and prune it a little further; why not let the Navy police the seas, as it would seem to be its legitimate employment? Why not turn over the gun-boats now owned by the Treasury Department, and called revenue-cutters, to the Navy, where they belong? And I will guarantee that the Admiral and his subordinate officers will do the service quite as well as it is now done, and here save a million annually, and I have no doubt more than that. And why not also put the light-houses under the charge of the Army or Navy, where they naturally belong, and save more money?

What I have here hastily said, Mr. Speaker, is said in all possible kindness, and with the profoundest respect for the able, genial, and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] I acknowledge him to be, in many respects, my leader in this House, and of whom I will be a delighted and devoted follower in all movements for reform, and in all that tends to the strictest national economy.

I will now return to the currency portion of my subject.

It is not the past, but it is the present and the future that most concern the Forty-third Congress. We want and must have a good national currency, and we want and must have economy; and let us see who will strike the first blow, and hold out the longest, and remain faithful to the end.

Economy and a good currency should go together, and in fact they are inseparable; then we shall have abundant prosperity. Greenbacks are good enough for all our purposes and wants. They will buy food and raiment and comforts for our families, purchase a homestead and shelter. They will educate our children, pay our taxes and tithes to the church, bury us when dead, and rear a tombstone at our graves; and is not this all we want of money?

FINANCE.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, I propose briefly to discuss the present financial condition of the country, and to seek, if possible, a remedy for the aggravated evils and unjust discriminations, through the baleful influence of which our people are impoverished and our industries prostrate. The innumerable theories advanced, each a supposed specific for every financial disorder, if they do not indicate a remedy, certainly prove the malignant character of the disease. The principal line of division separating our financiers is broad and deep. Inflation of the currency by some is insisted upon as the sovereign remedy, while by others contraction, until specie resumption is forced at the hazard of universal bankruptcy, is urged as the certain road to a sound financial condition. Between these two opposing forces, and partaking of the character of each, are the advocates of an elastic currency, which may be defined to be a currency so artfully arranged as to flow out freely and fill all the channels of trade in times of financial disaster, and when the danger is over to return rapidly to its place of repose. I do not seek a remedy in the ranks of either of these opposing forces.

Inflation of the currency, unless some element is infused to maintain its value, will not vitalize the decaying commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests of the country. Inflation, in co-operation with the legal-tender principle, will give temporary relief to the debtor class. If, however, the amount in circulation be in excess of the demands of legitimate business, it will not only depreciate in value, but will find employment in schemes of wild speculation similar to those that precipitated the recent financial panic. Contraction, with a view to forcing specie payment, instead of producing that result, will bankrupt the people of the South and West, where they are suffering for an increase of currency, and deplete the revenues of the Government, thereby greatly embarrassing the Treasury, and necessitating increased taxation.

With the enormous private indebtedness resting upon the people, and the small amount of specie in the country, payment in coin is impossible. To require the payment of debts in coin, contracted on the basis of currency depreciated from 10 to 30 per cent., is unjust in theory, and ruinous in its practical operation upon the country. I can understand the reason why the money-dealer desires the immediate resumption of specie payments by means of contraction. Contraction makes money scarce, property low, and interest high. If by means of contraction values shrink 50 per cent., the debtor must sell twice the amount of property to pay his debt, and the creditor can purchase twice the amount of commodities with the money.

The capitalists of the East loaned large amounts of money to our western people at 10 per cent. interest when gold was at a premium of from 10 to 30 per cent. In case of specie resumption, the difference in the value of the currency at the time of the loan and gold coin will be the measure of profit to the lender arising out of resumption.

What is the remedy? A knowledge of the causes that have produced the disasters in finance is necessary, before an intelligent and effective reform can be projected or accomplished. Trade, when not obstructed by legislation, flows in natural channels; and the prices of commodities are regulated by supply, demand, and unrestricted competition. Money, when not diverted by artificial means, through the operation of these laws, goes wherever it is required to perform its office as a medium for exchange of commodities. While our legal-tender paper money does not answer all the purposes of gold, the standard of value among all commercial nations, yet in the business of internal commerce it is governed by the same general laws. Financial distress may be brought on the country by misfortune, as in case of a failure of crops or war.

The panic of 1873 came on in the midst of abundant crops, and when all branches of business seemed to be prosperous. A careful investigation of our national banking system will, I think, fully disclose the cause, not only of the recent panic, but the subsequent paralysis of business.

Legislation in favor of a class is necessarily prejudicial to all other classes. While laws may be, and often are, so framed as to add to the wealth of those receiving Government bounty, the amount thus added to the wealth of the privileged class must be subtracted from the wealth of other classes. The railroad monopolists, by their control over the internal carrying trade of the country, impose grievous burdens on all our producers. The protected manufacturers also levy their contributions on the agricultural class. When the carrier takes two bushels of the farmer's grain for transporting one to market there is no concealment. The hand of the extortioner is plainly to be seen. When the farmer buys an agricultural implement, a barrel of salt, a yard of calico, or almost any other supply necessary to successfully prosecute his pursuits under cover of our iniquitous tariff laws, the protected monopolist slips his hand into the pockets of his victim and filches a portion of his hard earnings. These are monopolies of the second magnitude.

The monopoly in money created and sustained by our national banking system, controlling directly three hundred and fifty millions of our circulating medium through the agency of two thousand banks, is the ruling power in the Government. The first necessity of business prosperity is cheap money. The primary object of money dealers is to increase the price of money. The higher the rate of interest the larger the profits of the bank. Hence, when banks become an organized monopoly the price of money rules high.

If one man, or an association of men, had control of all the pork in the country, or of such a quantity that the residue would not supply the demand for consumption, the persons holding the larger quantity would have what I believe speculators call a "corner" on pork, and could dictate their own price for the article.

This is a fair illustration of our system of national banking. The amount of circulating medium in the form of legal-tenders is fixed by law at $356,000,000. The national banks are authorized to issue within a few millions of the amount of the greenbacks, and about $350,000,000 of the bank circulation have been issued. The bank-notes of all the banks are a legal tender at the counter of each bank, and in most of the fiscal transactions of the Government; so that for all purposes of internal commerce the notes of the banks are money. The national banks are also required by law to keep in their vaults legal-tender reserves in the sum of about $90,000,000. The banks may loan the amount of their own circulation and a large portion of the money of their depositors. Three-fifths of the amount of the reserves of the country banks may be deposited with associations, approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, in the redemption cities, and one-half of the amount of lawful reserves of the banks of the redemption cities may in like manner be kept on deposit in the city of New York.

These bank-notes, I presume, are rarely if ever presented for redemption. The Government indorsement gives value to all alike. The redemption of the supposed bank-note is simply an exchange of a note indorsed by the Government for another note made by the Government, there being no difference in the value of the two classes of paper. When the bank breaks its note for the first time commands a premium. It will thus be seen that, in addition to the laws of trade, which cause money to gravitate toward the business centers, the operation of our national banking laws furnish artificial channels through which the volume of our currency is forced to the center independently of the demands of trade and beyond the amount that can be legitimately employed. There is no channel left open through which the currency thus forced to the center can be returned to the people. It has been brought under the control of an unhealthy influence. Stock gambling employs it so actively that legitimate trade fails to withdraw it from the more attractive field of feverish speculation.

The banks that issued the notes are not expected to redeem them; hence there is no one moved by interest to return the bills to the banks of their issue. The notes of a bank located on the plains of Nebraska circulated just as freely in the city of New York as those issued within the shadow of Wall street. A paternal Government has become indorser for all; and the solvency or insolvency of the principal in no way affects the value of the note, for the payment of which the labor and capital of the whole American people stands pledged.

The currency driven through these artificial channels to New York, when needed by the producer to move his surplus, under the manipulations of Wall-street brokers, is absorbed in speculations, in watered stocks of railroads, to pay the interest on which additional carrying tolls are imposed on the people; and by its results raising the rates of interest, establishing excessive rates for transportation, depleting the legitimate avenues of trade, and making the stock-gambler the competitor of the people for the use of money. Such a system necessarily entails ruin on the producing and laboring classes. The centralized money power wielded by the national banks is used in the interest of the bulls or bears on change. Holding under their control almost the entire circulating medium of the country, these banks, by lending assistance to the reckless operators in Wall street, have the power to give a market value to bonds and stocks that are not expected to yield revenue to the holder.

If the fortunes of the confederates are to be advanced by depreciating the value of sound securities the power of the monopoly in money can be used with equal facility to bring about the desired result. To show I do no injustice to these institutions I quote from page 28 of the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency. He says:

> The present financial crisis may in a great degree be attributed to the intimate relations of the banks of the city of New York with the transactions of the stock board; more than one-fourth, and in many instances nearly one-third, of the bills receivable of the banks since the late civil war have consisted of demand loans to brokers and members of the stock board, which transactions have a tendency to impede and unsettle, instead of facilitating, the legitimate business of the whole country. * * * * * *
> The close of the war found the membership of the stock board increased to eleven hundred, and composed of men from all parts of the country, many of whom had congregated in Wall street, adopting for their rule of business the apt motto of Horace, "Make money; make it honestly if you can; at all events make money." * * The quotations of the stock board are known to be too frequently fictions of speculation, and yet these fictions control the commerce and business of a great country.

This picture is not drawn by an unfriendly hand, nor by one wanting in opportunity to know whereof he speaks. It is the criticism of the officer of the Government whose business it is to watch these institutions, to report their condition to Congress, andto take charge of and distribute the assets in case of insolvency, or when they violate the laws creating them.

He gives us the official information that these banks, under the control of which we have placed our whole financial system, are in "intimate relations" with the New York stock-board, "whose transactions have a tendency to impede the legitimate business of the whole country," and whose motto is, "Make money; make it honestly if you can; at all events make money."

The power which enables the associated banks in the city of New York to control the prices of stocks and bonds enables them in a great degree to regulate the prices of wheat and corn and all our other surplus products.

I have attempted to show that the national banks have the direct control of the larger portion of our circulating medium. This power enables them indirectly to control the residue. By refusing to discount and calling in their loans the central banks can at any time cause a stringency in the money market; the other banks being, to a great extent, influenced by the New York banks, caused mainly by the flow of currency to that city by operation of our national banking laws. It is estimated that 90 per cent. of the business of the whole country is done through the medium of checks, drafts, and bills of exchange, without the use of currency.

By means of these instrumentalities, which can only be made available through credit, the power of the New York banks is greatly increased. The evils growing out of expansion and contraction by the banks through their power over the bills, checks, and discounts, are the results but to a limited extent of the volume of the currency. It having been shown that under a safe financial administration the credit system, of bills, checks, and discounts, is nine times greater than cash payments, as a necessary result, when the panic destroyed the confidence of the banks in each other, the credit of the financial system, as well as the circulation, being centralized in the national banks, the confessed insolvency of the redemption banks paralyzed all trade. Having control of our circulating medium, the national banks also have control of all other facilities of exchange. Thus the monopoly of money and credit through the agency of the national banking system is made perfect, and the prices of the products of the fields, of the mines, and of the mills, go up or down in obedience to the orders of the centralized moneyed despotism. By reason of this system producers and consumers are in turn robbed.

When farm products are ready for market, the money needed to move the crops is withheld by the banks and prices rule low. When these products reach the hands of speculators, the persons having a corner on currency turn the screw the other way, money becomes abundant, and consumers are compelled to pay exorbitant prices. In this way all the profits of productive industry and labor are swallowed up by the money ring.

Legislation should be directed rather to the diffusion than to the centralization of money. The money power, when compactly organized, is dangerous to the liberties of the people. It not only affects every material interest of every citizen of the Republic, acting upon the distribution of food and clothing, and upon the wages of labor, but also wields a political power that is well-nigh omnipotent.

This power can withhold bread from the hungry, withdraw not only the comforts, but the necessaries of life, from the family circle; impoverish the treasuries of State and Federal Governments, and overthrow individual fortunes by a single blow that no skill can avert. To secure the protection of monopoly in money, the advocates of that system inculcate false theories of finance, calculated to enrich money-dealers and impoverish the people. The man educated behind the counter of a bank, whose life has been devoted to the study of ways and means to increase the dividends of the bank, is looked upon as an able financier. The opinions of a man thus educated are sought after by legislators upon questions of finance, and have greater weight than is accorded to the most intelligent man engaged in the production of commodities, and whose success contributes largely to the wealth of the country.

The interest, and therefore the constant study and education, of the money-dealer is to make money dear; in doing which he subtracts from the value of and degrades labor. The duty of the legislator is to make labor valuable, and thereby elevate the people. The most potent instrumentality to accomplish this result is to make money cheap. Conceding the truth of these statements, which appear to me to be undeniable, are we not false to every correct theory of finance, to the interests of the people, and the perpetuation of liberty, when we surrender by law to the money-lender the control of the financial administration?

There is no more appropriate way to illustrate the conflict constantly existing in all organized societies between capital and labor than by, in the simplest manner, exhibiting the education and the interest of the money-dealer on the one hand, and the necessities of the laborer and the producer on the other. Money, by arbitrary commercial laws, is made the representative of values. The more you diffuse it, the more competition you make for its sale to the people. The more you centralize and consolidate it, the more you subject the necessities of the laborer and producer to its iron decrees. The interest and education of the banker is to make money dear. The necessities of the people, and therefore the highest demands of the country, require that money be made cheap.

Another weighty reason in favor of the total abolition of the national banking system is that the special privileges conferred by the laws of its creation, can only be enjoyed by the holders of a certain species of property—the same property thus selected as the exclusive basis for bank circulation being exempt by pre-existing laws from all the burdens of Federal, State, and municipal taxation. The fortunate holder of United States interest-bearing bonds, upon depositing them with the Treasurer of the United States, becomes the favored borrower from the Government, without interest, of 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited in national currency, equal in value to legal-tender notes. The banking associations receiving this currency from the United States are authorized "to circulate the same as money, and their notes are to be received at par in all parts of the United States in payment of taxes, excises, public lands, and all other dues to the United States except for duties on imports, and also for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations, within the United States except interest on the public debt and in redemption of the national currency." Each of the national banking associations is also bound by law to receive the notes of all the others at par.

Let us for a moment look at the inequality of this law in its operations as between the banks and the Government. In the first instance, the Government became a borrower. The bonds placed on deposit with the Treasurer are the evidence of the debt of the Government for the money borrowed.

The loan was made to the Government by the holders of these bonds in currency, which was at a discount of from 20 to 50 per cent. The Government pays interest on the face of these bonds at 6 per cent. in gold. The Government becomes the responsible custodian of the bonds, and pays the interest to the owner just as promptly as though they were in the vaults of the bank. The bonds are worth just as much, and the banker realizes the same amount of interest on them as though no currency had been issued to him on the security of the bonds.

Instead of charging the banker 6 per cent. gold interest on this currency, he receives it and has the use of it without interest. Instead of requiring the banker to pay any indebtedness he may owe the Government in gold, he can pay such indebtedness, except duties on imports, in the same currency the Government gives him the use of without interest. And, finally, in order that the banker may never be called upon to redeem his notes, the Government becomes his indorser, and requires e very other national bank to receive them at par. Even the mere fiction of redemption, provided for by law, goes only to the extent of requiring the redemption to be made in United States notes. The sole compensation for these extraordinary privileges is the trifling tax paid by the banks to the Government on their circulation. The business men of the country pay an average of 1 per cent. a month to the banks for the use of this currency, in addition to being compelled to submit to the monopoly created and fostered by the system. The principal channel through which money thus protected and centralized reaches the farmers of the West is through the agents of eastern capitalists. These agents charge 5 or 6 per cent. commission for negotiating the loan, which is paid by the borrower, in addition to interest at 10 per cent. per annum, paid semi-annually; and the debt is secured by a deed of trust on lands worth threefold the amount of the loan.

Thus the bondholder borrows money from the Government secured by bonds 10 per cent. in excess of the amount of the loan, upon which he pays 1 per cent tax; and the farmer of the West pays from 12 to 15 per cent. for the same money, secured by land equal in value to three times the amount of the loan. If this system does not create a privileged class; if it does not enrich the few and impoverish the many; and if it will not operate to so centralize capital that the people and public liberty will both be prostrated, I humbly concede that the laws of cause and effect are totally beyond the grasp of my mind.

The question may be asked why should the farmers on the rich and productive prairies of the West be compelled to borrow money from eastern capitalists? Can they not, in the valley of the Mississippi, with a soil of capacity to feed the world, make money to meet all their wants? I answer they cannot; and the reason of the failure may be found in the fact that too many other interests are protected at their expense. The manufacturers of iron and steel, salt and lumber, woolen goods and cotton goods, shoes and boots, and almost every instrument used in farming or supplies consumed by the farmer and his family, are protected by our tariff laws, adding greatly to their cost. Almost every article entering into the construction and equipment of railroads is in like manner protected, and the cost of transportation thereby greatly increased. The centralization of money under the national banking law places the circulating medium beyond the reach of productive industry, except in competition with gamblers in stocks, who deal in "mere fictions of value," and who, acting in harmony with the central money power, are enabled to dominate the legitimate business of the whole country.

At the beginning of the recent panic, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, stock-gamblers held in their hands over $60,000,000 of the money of the country banks, drawn there under the operation of the national banking system, and loaned to them by the associated banks. The moneyed monopoly, acting upon the transportation and manufacturing monopolies, draws the whole to a common center, and fixes the seat of their power in the East. Hence the substance of the people of the West is all drawn to the same center, in payment of costs of transportation, bounties to manufacturers, and interest to the money-lenders.

But, sir, it is said that the national banks furnish the best currency we have ever had; that the bill-holder is protected against panics; that the notes circulate in all parts of the country without discount; and that hence the system ought to be perpetuated. I admit that the bill-holder is protected, not by the character of the banks or the security of their administration, but by the guarantee of the Government. I deny, however, that this system of banking is any sort of protection against the evil effects of panics. Under a sound and healthy financial condition, prices of products are regulated by well-known laws. If the circulating medium is liable to constant fluctuations in value, thereby affecting the prices of commodities, in opposition to the natural laws regulating the same, there can be no stability in business transactions. Every man engaged in agricultural, commercial, or manufacturing pursuits carries on his business and incurs liabilities at the risk of bankruptcy; not because of any want of judgment, or through improvidence on his part, but on account of the fluctuations in the value of the circulation. Our bank-notes are totally wanting in the element of stability in value, and hence are an active cause in producing money panics.

In order to keep posted as to the value of this currency the business man watches market reports, as well to see the daily quotations showing the value of these notes as to see the market price of other property. No species of currency in this country, prior to the late war, was ever subject to such sudden, constant, and violent fluctuations. We never had a circulating medium that furnished less security to those engaged in business pursuits than the notes of the national banks. These fluctuations in the value of our circulation are caused by the gambling operations in Wall street, created by the centralizing tendencies of the national banks. The distinction in value between the circulation and gold is the corner stone upon which speculation is built, and it is the interest and constant study of the stock-gamblers to perpetuate that distinction. When Wall street was broke at the commencement of the panic our circulation increased in value in a few days about 9 per cent. The moment the stock board was opened the depreciation of the greenbacks toward the old standard commenced.

If there had been any doubt before as to the policy of abolishing the national banks, the conduct of the associated banks since the beginning of our present financial misfortunes ought to remove that doubt. It will be remembered that the associated banks in the redemption cities are the pets of the Government. The law seems to have been purposely framed to draw all the money of the country into the vaults of these banks, and through them to the New York City banks. In the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, made one year ago, he says:

> The reserves of the nineteen hundred national banks located elsewhere than in the city of New York are held, to a great extent, in that city. For most of the time during the past year an amount equal to more than one-fifth of the capital of all these national banks has been held on deposit by the national banks of the city of New York to the credit of their correspondents. In many cases these credits amount to twice the capital of the bank with which they are deposited; in other cases the amount of deposits is three, four, and even five times the capital.

On the 12th of September last the national banks in New York City were indebted to national banks in the sum of $72,257,769.25, and the stock-gamblers of that city were indebted to the national banks of the city in the sum of $60,000,000. At the same time there was due, from the national banks in the other redemption cities, to national banks the sum of $43,649,018. How much of the latter sum was in the hands of stock-brokers I have not learned.

Thus we see that, at the time of the commencement of the panic, the national banks of the sixteen redemption cities held over $115,000,000 belonging to other national banks, and we may safely assume that nearly all of that immense sum was in the hands of persons using it in illegitimate speculations.

When the panic came, what was the course adopted by these favored banks in the redemption cities? Did they, to the extent of their ability, respond to the rightful demands of the other banks? The money which had been placed in the custody of the central banks as a sacred trust under the law, to be held for the protection of the depositors of the country banks, was witheld in violation of the national banking law. The country banks, having deposited their money with the redemption city banks in accordance with the provisions of law, when they drew for their money, in order to meet the demands of their creditors, and for purposes of legitimate business, to move the surplus products of the country, had their drafts dishonored.

The associated banks, under the pretense of relieving the stringency and to aid in moving produce from the interior to the markets, inaugurated a system in violation of law, and unparalleled in the history of finance, which ought not to be tolerated by the people. They put collaterals in the hands of a committee, the character of which collaterals is unknown, and on these collaterals forced into public circulation a large amount of what are known as bank certificates of deposits, and another class known as certified checks, thus poisoning our circulation and tending by its operation to lock up and withdraw from legitimate fields the currency guaranteed by the Government. The pretext was to move the crops and pay depositors. The real use to which these illegal issues were devoted was to float the stocks upon which the banks had made the call loans into public confidence.

An investigation of the supplies of produce in the cities for consumption since the commencement of the panic exhibits the fact that the supplies, as compared with past years, were insignificant. The whole of the assets of many of the banks being used to bull gambling stocks, the mills and grain buyers of the cities had no money to buy with, and in the early period of the fall and winter market the foreign buyers had no competition in the purchase of meat and breadstuffs. The result was that grain shipped abroad for foreign consumption was sold at low rates, and until the imperative demand for bread by the people of the cities threatened public disorder these banks withheld home competition for our products, sent thus abroad for less than their value, whereby the producer was robbed of a large share of legitimate profits.

This practice of certifying uncovered checks is not limited to the clearing-house association. I have seen the statement made, purporting to be on the authority of a report made to the clearing-house association, to the effect that "so extensively has this practice been pursued by several institutions that the amount of such checks which have passed daily through the clearing-house has reached in some instances to twice and three times, and in one or two instances to four and five times, the amount of their capital stock; and this through long periods of time." The certification of uncovered checks by a national bank is in direct violation of the act of March 3, 1869; and in cases of violation of that act it is made the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to appoint a receiver and put the bank in liquidation. Who can tell the amount of these illegal issues of the national banks and the clearing-house associations? Have they been redeemed, or are they still outstanding? Did not the banks in all the redemption cities engage in this illegal practice? Without official information can this House tell whether these banks are solvent or insolvent? The Comptroller of the Currency is clothed not only with the power, but the duty is imposed on him, to examine the financial condition of the banks and to make known the result of the examination; and if they have violated the laws it is his duty to put them in liquidation.

It is claimed by the defenders of this system that through its influence the country is being restored to a healthy financial condition. The incorrectness of this assumption is shown by the fact that a large number of the banks have no confidence in each other and are daily refusing to buy or cash drafts made by or against them; exhibiting the fact that those who have immediate control of the system have lost faith in its solvency, and through that want of confidence have destroyed the whole credit system, which, as has been shown, is nine times more disastrous to trade than locking up the circulation. The whole system is a ruin, and like other ruins the fields it occupies are worthless until the obstructions are removed.

What is the remedy proposed by the Committee on Banking and Currency? We are invited to extend and perpetuate the system and enable all holders of interest-bearing bonds to borrow money from the Government without interest; to enlarge and intensify the monopoly in money, which will further increase its price and place the value of labor more completely at the mercy of the money power.

Will this House attempt to erect a permanent financial structure, the corner-stone of which consists of banks that have confessed their insolvency by refusing to pay their depositors, and while their illegal and depreciated checks obstruct the free circulation of money, and thereby entail bankruptcy upon business men and poverty and distress upon labor? This question must be answered to an intelligent and now inquiring constituency, by their Representatives in Congress. Sir, the first step in the direction of a sound financial condition is to repeal the acts under which the national banks were organized. Let the bank circulation be retired and legal-tender Treasury-notes be substituted in their stead, to be used in the redemption or purchase of interest-bearing bonds.

By this course the bank monopoly will be overthrown, and the threatened central moneyed despotism will be averted. The banking interest will no longer be pensioners on the people in the annual sum of $21,000,000 in gold. The people will select their own bankers, instead of trusting those selected by the Federal Government.

It is said that the faith of the Government is pledged that no more than $400,000,000 legal-tenders shall be issued.

Our predecessors had the right to pass a law binding us to the payment of a debt, but they had no power to restrict us in the exercise of any constitutional mode in raising means to pay it. If in order to strengthen the credit of the notes issued by the Government at any given time in the past, Congress had made a pledge that no additional notes should ever be issued by the Government, would that pledge have been binding upon us? Are we not clothed with the same power and discretion to determine what legislation is necessary to meet the exigencies of this day, as were our predecessors to provide for their own time?

These questions admit of but one answer, unless we are ready to surrender all the functions of legislation. Whatever pledge was made by previous legislation upon this subject has already been violated in the interest of the national bank. In substance and in effect, though not in form, the national-bank notes are the notes of the Government, and partly by virtue of positive law, and partly through commercial custom, these notes perform all the offices of money.

The only value of the pledge to any one consists in the supposed appreciation of the legal-tenders toward the gold standard by the limitation of the amount to be issued. This pledge could have been intended for the benefit of no one except the holders of the legal-tenders, who constitute the great body of the people.

Sir, inflation of the currency through the medium of the national-bank notes affects the value of the greenbacks in the precise ratio that they would be affected by the issue of an equal amount of greenbacks. Congress had no scruples in violating the pledge, when the demand was made in the interest of the national banks. Now, when the demand is made in the interest of the people, and no one can claim an adverse interest except the banks, the pledge is set up in their behalf; and it is claimed that they have vested rights involved in the question, just as the railroad monopolies in the States claim that they have vested rights to inflict wrong and extortion upon the people by means of exorbitant freight and passenger charges.

Another beneficial effect to follow the abolition of the national-banking system, will be the release of the legal-tender reserves held by the national banks. On the 12th of September last, the amount so held, was, in round numbers $92,000,000, and I suppose we may assume that amount to be a fair average. Over $50,000,000 of this sum was held in the redemption cities. If the national-banking law was abolished, these reserves would be returned to the country banks, the currency of the country would be diffused, and the stringency now complained of would be entirely removed. The call for more currency would be answered without any considerable increase in the amount of issue, and the supposed danger incident to expansion would be measurably avoided.

The main cause of our financial trouble being disposed of, the question arises what is to be done with the greenbacks? Shall they be permitted to float on without redemption, for an indefinite period, and finally be repudiated? Such is not my idea of political morality. On the other hand, our legislation ought to be so shaped as gradually to bring the legal-tenders up to par with gold. I would not do this by contraction unless at some time in the future the amount in circulation should be found to be in excess of the requirements of business. If we had the power to make greenbacks a legal tender for all purposes, they would approach very nearly the value of gold. If they could be used in payment of customs there would be an increased demand for greenbacks, and but little demand for gold, except by the Government, and the legal-tenders would be greatly appreciated.

Here again, unfortunately, we are met with pledges. The pledge has been given that the customs shall be collected in gold, and applied to the payment of the interest on the public debt. And certain forms of the public debt are specifically made payable in coin. These pledges go beyond the mode of raising money to pay with, and prescribe the kind of money that shall be collected and applied in payment.

The legislation of the country has in other respects discriminated against the greenbacks and in favor of the interest-bearing bonds. The result has been to appreciate the value of the bonded debt so as to make it approach near to par with gold, while the legal-tenders have been, and are, kept greatly below that standard.

The act of March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," was more effective in weakening the credit of the legal-tenders than all other causes combined. The principal of the five-twenty bonds was, according to law and equity, payable in legal-tender notes after five years from the date of their issue, at the option of the Government, but were not absolutely due for twenty years from the date of issue. These bonds had been purchased with legal-tenders, and were a part of the same temporary expedient to meet the exigencies of war. In order that the Government might pay this debt in the same currency used in its creation, the time limited within which the Government had the option to pay it did not extend beyond the period of the probable circulation, as money, of the legal-tender notes. The exercise of the power to redeem the bonds in legal-tenders, at the expiration of the optional period of redemption, would have enabled the Government to maintain an equilibrium in the value of the bonds and greenbacks, and as a necessary result would have added to the value of the circulating medium.

The increased demand for greenbacks for the use of the Government would have added greatly to their value, while a much larger proportion of the taxes might have been paid in currency. The surplus gold in the Treasury could have been used in the redemption or purchase of the legal-tenders, and they in turn could have been reissued and used in the redemption of the five-twenty bonds. This process would have strengthened the public credit most effectually, by restoring soundness to the very foundation upon which rest the credit of Government and the security of the people.

The legal-tenders were declared by act of Congress to be unworthy to be used in the redemption of the five-twenty bonds. The further declaration was made that none of the interest-bearing bonds should be paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes should be convertible in coin at the option of the holder, or unless bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest could be sold at par in coin. The Government, almost immediately after its passage, commenced the purchase of five-twenty bonds at a large premium, paying therefor in greenbacks. The whole amount thus purchased, beginning in May, 1869, and ending in September, 1873, is $323,253,800. The average premium paid is a little over 12¼ per cent. The whole amount of the premium paid in the purchase of these bonds is, in round numbers, $40,000,000. So that this act to strengthen the public credit has cost the country forty millions in taxes, and cursed it with a depreciated currency; and the gold in the Treasury, which ought to have been used to strengthen the Government paper which was in the hands of the mass of the people, has been used to bull or bear the gambler's stocks in Wall street and to buoy up the value of interest-bearing bonds.

This policy should be reversed at once, and all the legitimate powers of the Government should be used to increase the value of the circulating medium. The plan heretofore has been to increase the price of the interest-bearing bonds, and then to tax the people in order to purchase them at the enhanced price.

To show that the effect of this bill to strengthen the public credit has been simply to widen the margin between the value of legal-tenders and interest-bearing bonds, I refer to the fact that the average cost of bonds purchased in May, 1869, in gold, was a fraction over 82, while in October, 1869, the average cost was a fraction over 99; and the average cost of the purchases since the last date has been very nearly at the last-named sum. While the average premium in legal-tenders on the purchases in May, 1869, was a little under 16, and on the purchase in September 24, 1873, the premium was a little less than 11.

Thus we see that under this policy the value of the bonds on the gold standard has increased about seventeen cents on the dollar, while the premium on the legal-tender standard has decreased but five cents on the dollar.

Instead of entitling this law "An act to strengthen the credit of the Government," it should have been entitled "An act to strengthen the power of the money monopoly over the people, to increase the burdens of taxation, and to perpetuate high rates of interest, to the ruin of every industrial pursuit."

Sir, as a result of such a policy as I have been attempting to portray, every industrial interest in the country now lies prostrate. The people have been the witnesses of this class legislation, and under an unnatural stimulus given to some classes of business by the protective policy, aided by a depreciated currency, and the inherent, undeveloped capacity of a new country, they were falsely told and made to believe that they were in the midst of unexampled prosperity. The delusion has passed away. The prosperity was all fictitious. The attempt to create wealth by speculation, and without labor, has failed, as it always will fail. The country must be restored to its normal condition. The whole protective policy must be abandoned, and the people be left to choose the pursuits in which they will engage.

The attempt has been made to create the impression that the abolition of the national banks will disturb financial relations and destroy trade. The legal-tenders will flow into immediate circulation as the bank notes are absorbed. The money locked up by the banks will be paid out pro rata to their creditors, and the reserves will go into circulation among the people. The abolition of the national banks abolishes stock-gambling and forces the hundred million, now used by them to the detriment of every material interest, into legitimate fields. A sound financial system will immediately take the place of insolvent banks, whose struggles for perpetuation are now obstructing all the avenues of trade.

On motion of Mr. SPEER, the House (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

Mr. KELLY. I present some petitions of citizens of Oregon, concerning charges against Hon. J. H. MITCHELL and asking the Senate to investigate the same.

Mr. President, I have been requested by a number of citizens of Oregon to present these petitions, in which they prefer certain charges against my colleague, and ask the Senate to inquire into their truth. In this connection I desire to state that having been well acquainted with Senator MITCHELL for twelve years prior to his election as a member of this body, I knew nothing during all that time derogatory to his character or reputation. With regard to the charges preferred, I wish it to be understood that I do not now express any opinion upon them either one way or another. That is a matter I leave wholly with the committee, as it is a proper subject for their investigation.

And now, having discharged this unpleasant duty, I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, in relation to the Kansas Pacific and Union Pacific Railroad Companies; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FENTON. I present the petition of John Fisk, of Suspension Bridge, New York, who represents that he is the original inventor of the iron-clad ram for harbor defense, as set forth in the memorandum and affidavits which I submit with this petition. He asks that the same rights and benefits be granted to him as to the person who claimed to be the inventor of the Monitor, believing his invention to be superior to that in its operations.

I ought to say that I know Colonel Fisk to be a highly respectable and worthy citizen, residing at Suspension Bridge, New York, to whose statements respect is due. I became acquainted with him during the period of the war, as the gallant leader of the Sixth New York Cavalry. I move that this petition, with the papers, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I suppose that is the proper direction for them to take.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of the members and congregation of the Society of Friends of Brooklyn, New York, signed by Henry Dickinson and other officers, and the petition of the Congregational church, of Sayville, Suffolk County, New York, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present a petition of citizens of Clay County, Iowa, setting forth that at the present time of financial trouble, while business is embarrassed or suspended, and labor unemployed, it will be oppressive to restore the duty on tea and coffee, or to revive or increase internal taxation. They also set forth that, in accordance with the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, a reduction was made of 10 per cent. of duties upon manufactured cottons, woolens, irons, steel, paper, leather, glass, metals, and other staple commodities, and that under this law one-tenth of the duties upon imports of these wares has been handed back to the foreigners who send them to our markets, instead of going into the Treasury of the United States. They represent that they believe the legislation above set forth is wrong in principle, and they ask its repeal. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Approved February 3, 1874.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Memorial and joint resolution in reference to improving Fox and Wisconsin Rivers.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa represents, that the annual report of D C. Houston, of the United States engineers, on the Fox and Wisconsin River improvement, shows that the project of rendering navigable the channels of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers is entirely feasible, at a moderate expense; and whereas the General Government has already entered upon said work; and as said improvement is of great national importance: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our members of Congress be requested to urge the appropriation of a sufficient sum of money to carry this great enterprise to a successful completion: Provided, That the regulation and control of the entire route from the Mississippi River to the lakes may be retained in the General Government, and shall not pass under the control of any private corporation or company, to the end that the transportation of the products of the country may be subjected only to such tolls as may be necessary to maintain said improvement in perfect condition and repair for public use.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is directed to forward a copy of this preamble and joint resolution to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with a request that they may be laid before each House of Congress, and that a copy be sent to each Senator and Member of Congress from this State.

JOHN H. GEAR,
Speaker of the House.

JAMES M. WEART,
Chief Clerk.

Mr. ALLISON presented the following resolution of the Legislature of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed:

Preamble and concurrent resolution relative to the reissue of the patents on sewing-machines.

Whereas it is understood that the owners of the patents on the leading sewing-machines in the United States are using every exertion to have the present Congress extend their patents; and whereas we believe that such an extension would not be in accordance with the welfare and wishes of the people: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house, (the senate concurring,) First, that our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence to prevent the reissue of the patents on sewing-machines; secondly, that the secretary of state be instructed to furnish each of our Senators and Congressmen a copy of this preamble and concurrent resolution.

JOHN H. GEAR,
Speaker of the House.
JOSEPH DYSART,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 2, 1874.

C. C. CARPENTER.

I present also a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, in regard to the Santillan land grant, a large grant in the city of San Francisco, which has been passed on heretofore by the board constituted to pass upon land claims in California, and decided there to be a fraud. I understand that the matter is pending in the other House at the present time, and this is a resolution of the Legislature of the State of California on that subject, requesting the Senators here and the Representatives in the other House to oppose that bill. We therefore earnestly request you to use your best endeavors to provide such increase of the currency as public necessities require.

This is in the nature of a petition signed by the members of the Legislature of Illinois, of all parties. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

DANIEL M'CLURE.

Mr. KELLY. I wish the consent of the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It refers the claims of Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general, for credits on differences in his accounts as paymaster, under his official bond dated March 2, 1859, to the Court of Claims, with jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims; and if the court shall be satisfied from the evidence that any of the moneys charged to him were not in fact received by him, or that other just and equitable grounds exist for credits claimed by him, it shall make a decree setting forth the amount to which McClure shall be entitled to receive credit, upon which the proper accounting officers of the Treasury shall allow him the amount so decreed as a credit in the settlement of his said accounts. The testimony of McClure is to be received in his own behalf by the court. Until the determination of the cause, the final adjustment of his accounts is to be suspended. An appeal is to be allowed to either party, as in other cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

D. B. ALLEN & CO.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to take up the bill for the relief of D. B. Allen & Co.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 439) to provide for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for services in carrying the United States mails, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It appropriates $21,543 for the payment of D. B. Allen and Co. for carrying the United States mails between New York and San Francisco, in 1864 and 1865, during the suspension of the overland mail service on the overland route, in full payment for the service.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to say that that bill has several times passed this body, but failed to reach action in the House. There is a very brief report, if any Senator wishes to hear it read, which explains the case.

Mr. BOREMAN. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAM-

LIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, on the 5th instant:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of D. B. Allen & Co., representing the Atlantic Steamship and the Pacific Mail Steamship Companies, for compensation for carrying the United States mails during the suspension of the overland mail service, in 1864 and 1865, beg leave to report:

The suspension of the overland mail service, by reason of Indian hostilities on the plains, took place in 1864; that the amount paid for said service annually was $840,000, while $160,000 annually was paid to said steamship companies for carrying printed matter and such letters as might be marked to be specially sent that way.

When the suspension occurred, leaving the entire Pacific slope without mails, the Postmaster-General applied to said steamship companies to carry the entire mails during the interruption of the overland route. The companies cheerfuly complied, and for a period of about four months all mails of the United States for the Pacific were safely and expeditiously transported by them. For this service compensation is claimed.

The matter has been submitted to the Postmaster-General, who reports that there is justly due D. B. Allen & Co. the sum of $21,543, in strict conformity to the spirit of the law.

Your committee believe that said parties are justly entitled to a much larger sum; but that sum having been stated by the Postmaster-General as due, and as the parties mentioned prefer to take that sum rather than to provoke controversy and incur delay, and will accept it in full discharge of the claim, the committee report a bill for said sum. This claim would have been paid at the time the services were rendered if the Department had been in possession of funds with which to pay the same. A bill passed the Senate during the last Congress for the same purpose.

Mr. BOREMAN. I make no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES M'DONALD.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 238) permitting James McDonald, a warrant officer of the Navy, to accept a silver medal from the government of Italy.

Mr. PRATT. I submit that the Senate had better proceed to the consideration of the Calendar in order, so that these cases may all be considered in their regular order—I mean the unobjected cases. That has been the practice heretofore, and I see no reason why we should depart from it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Indiana objects the Chair will submit the question to the Senate. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 238.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize James McDonald, a warrant officer of the Navy of the United States, to accept a silver medal awarded him by the royal minister of the marine in behalf of the government of Italy, for assistance rendered on the 25th day of June, 1873, in the port of Callao, to the Italian merchant-vessel Delaide, on board of which a fire had broken out.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS ON FORT RANDALL RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bills on the Calendar at the point where the call was last terminated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar at the point where it is now resumed, is the bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate; and the amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT STEILACOOM MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 254) to donate the military reservation at Fort Steilacoom to the Territory of Washington for the use of the insane asylum; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to donate section 33 of township numbered 20 north, of range numbered 2 east, of Willamette meridian, embracing a portion of Fort Steilacoom military reservation and the military barracks thereon, in the county of Pierce, Territory of Washington, to that Territory, for the use and purpose of an asylum for the insane of the Territory, and for no other purpose; but this act is not to be construed or have the effect to impair any rights of any person in or to any portion of the lands acquired under any of the land laws of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. W. ELLIOTT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 310) for the relief of W. W. Elliott; which was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to W. W. Elliott, of Mulberry Grove, Illinois, from the funds of the Medical and Hospital Department, a sum equal to $100 per month, from April 20, 1862, to May 29, 1863, the period of his services as an acting assistant surgeon, deducting all pay and allowances received by him as an enlisted man during the same period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH MONTANARI.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 311) for the reliefof Joseph Montanari, and for other purposes; which was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of State to audit and allow the claim of Joseph Montanari for services as vice-consul of the United States at Port Mahon, together with loss by exchange; and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Joseph Montanari the amount so audited and allowed. The second section provides that section 21 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," approved August 18, 1856, shall not be construed so as to prevent compensation being allowed and paid out of appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the United States to vice-consuls-general, vice-consuls, or vice commercial agents, who are not or may not be citizens of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no amendment be offered the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I see the Senator who reported this bill [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] rising to speak to it, and I withhold a question for that reason. I should like to hear an explanation.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. In 1856 Congress enacted a law having reference to the appointment of consuls and vice-consuls. It provides that the vice-consuls shall perform the duties of consuls only in case the consuls are absent or unable to perform those duties. It also provides that there shall be no salary and no pay to a vice-consul, except that which would come from the pay of the consul. It also provides that no money shall be paid to these officers unless they are citizens of the United States. Mr. Montanari is not a citizen of the United States. He performed the duties of consul at Port Mahon, in the absence of the consul; and according to the former construction of the accounting officers he was entitled to his pay. They construed the law as applicable only to consuls, and not to vice-consuls. But recently they have put a new construction on the law, and say they can make no difference; and when the draft was made for payment for the services of Mr. Montanari, it was protested, and he is without the money due him for services which he has rendered, services which would have been rendered by the consul if he had been there. This bill provides for his payment.

The second section of the bill authorizes the officers of the Government to pay vice-consuls if they are not citizens of the United States, and it arises from the fact that it is difficult and often impossible for the Government to appoint vice-consuls who are citizens of the United States in some localities, because there is so little service for them to perform that they will not remain a year or two, or three, in a place, holding the appointment of vice-consul, when they can receive only incidental pay for one, or two, or three weeks' service. It is absolutely necessary in such cases for the Government, if they would have this duty performed, to appoint men who are not citizens; and this bill provides that in such cases payment may be made to them the same as though they were citizens of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to postpone the pending business and ask the Senate to allow me to call up, on Wednesday morning, the bill from the other House in regard to the centennial exhibition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to assign Wednesday, after the expiration of the morning hour, for the consideration of the House bill in relation to the centennial exhibition. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. Until the banking bill is disposed of I shall object; but after that I shall have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 218) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make final settlement with the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan and Indiana under treaty stipulations existing with them.

Mr. DAVIS. I see that the Senator who reported this bill [Mr. INGALLS] is out of his seat. It appropriates a large amount of money, and I should like to look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

COLUMBIA RAILWAY COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 211) to amend the charter of the Columbia Railway Company of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON. I should like to understand that better than I do now. I object for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ELIZABETH F. THOMPSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 316) granting a pension to Elizabeth F. Thompson; which was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth F. Thompson, mother of Moses Goodwin, late a private in Company I, Ninth Regiment of Maine Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY C. SMITH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Henry C. Smith, of Indianapolis, Indiana; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to place the name of Henry C. Smith on the rolls as first lieutenant in Company H, Thirty-sixth Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, as of the date of June 18, 1865; and to direct the proper accounting and pay officers to pay to Smith the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant from that date until the date of his discharge, deducting any sum or sums he may have received during that service.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to amend the bill in line 5 by striking out "Thirty-sixth" and inserting "Thirtieth," which was the number of the regiment. There is an error in printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDERSON J. SMITH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 341) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is a direction to the Paymaster-General of the Army to pay to Anderson J. Smith, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of infantry from May 6, 1864, to the date of his muster out of service, on the 17th day of June, 1865, deducting whatever pay he received for that term as sergeant.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator who reported this bill to tell us why it is to be.

Mr. KELLY. I ask for the reading of the report accompanying the bill, which will explain the case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 20th of January:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Anderson J. Smith, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

Anderson J. Smith, late a sergeant in Company C, Seventy-seventh Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, was captured by the rebel forces at the battle of Mansfield, up Red River, on the 8th day of April, 1864, and was detained as a prisoner from that time until the 17th day of May, 1865, at Camp Ford, in Texas. During this period he appears to have rendered much needful service as a physician and surgeon to United States prisoners at that place.

On the 22d day of July, 1864, he was commissioned by Governor Yates a first lieutenant of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, with rank from May 6, 1864; but owing to the fact that he was detained a prisoner of war, never received his commission as such. On the 17th day of June, 1865, he was discharged from the service of the United States at Springfield, Illinois.

Inasmuch as he was unable to perform the duties of first lieutenant by reason of confinement as a prisoner of war, the committee consider that he is entitled to payment as such, and report a bill accordingly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, which was reported by the Committee on Finance on the 21st of January last, with an amendment.

The amendment was read, being to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of five persons, neither of whom shall be the holder of any office of profit or trust in the General or a State government. The said commissioners shall be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation, and shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed one year. It shall be their duty to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic in its economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects, in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and also inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and restrictive legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners shall serve without salary; shall be authorized to employ a secretary at a reasonable compensation, not to exceed $2,000 per year, which, with the necessary expenses incidental to said investigation, of both the secretary and commissioners, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon vouchers to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the amount necessary is hereby appropriated. It shall be the further duty of said commissioners to report the result of their investigation, and the expenses attending the same, to the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Let that bill go over. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut objects.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not wish this bill to go over so as to lose its place on the Calendar, and inasmuch as we have not time, probably, to consider it this morning, to prevent its losing its place I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, unless it can be understood that it will be the first bill on the Calendar to be considered to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair is that it does not lose its place on the Calendar, and to-morrow the Senate will proceed with the Calendar at the point where they terminate the call to-day. This bill will still be on the Calendar and still in its place.

Mr. WRIGHT. And be the first bill taken up when the Calendar is called again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, it will not, if it is passed over to-day. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill which has just been read.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I now move that the bill be laid aside and be the first bill on the Calendar to-morrow morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that will be done, and in the mean time Senators can look at the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa can move to make it the special order, which will put it at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I make that motion, that it be made the special order for to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the bill just read be placed at the head of the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 27, noes 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair is, under this vote of the Senate, that the consideration of this bill will be resumed whenever the Calendar is resumed.

TITLES OF NAVAL ENGINEERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers.

The Chief Clerk read the bill. It proposes to change the title of first assistant engineer to passed assistant engineer, and that the title of second assistant engineer shall be changed to assistant engineer.

Mr. CONKLING. I see that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is not present, and we ought to have some explanation of that bill, I think. If he is not in the Chamber, it had better lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made the bill will lie over.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a mere change of the title of these officers, and it has the approbation of the Department.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator whether it increases their pay by changing them from one grade to another?

Mr. ANTHONY. O, no; it makes the title correspond with that of similar officers.

Mr. CONKLING. It is merely nominal in effect?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is all.

Mr. LOGAN. Does it make an assistant engineer out of an engineer?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; let it be read again.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Naval Affairs report the bill with an amendment, to strike out the words "and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith be, and are hereby, repealed," and to insert as section 2 the following:

SEC. 2. That from and after the 13th day of June, 1874, the course of instruction at the Naval Academy for cadet engineers shall be four years, instead of two as now provided by law; and this provision shall first apply to the class of cadet engineers entering the Academy in the year 1874, and to all subsequent classes; and that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and are hereby, repealed.

Mr. ANTHONY. The second section is an important one, and perhaps the chairman of the committee had better be here when it is considered. The first section, to which I referred, is merely nominal, to make the title of engineers correspond in their different grades to the title of similar officers.

Mr. CONKLING. I believe the morning hour has expired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill in relation to national-bank circulation.

MATTHEW WOODRUFF.

Mr. BOGY. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 365, for the relief of Matthew Woodruff. It will not take a moment; it is a very meritorious claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to consider the bill indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be taken up, subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be taken up, subject to a call for the regular order.

The bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of War to correct the record so as to honorably muster out and discharge Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteers; and that said Woodruff be allowed such back pay, bounty, and allowances as he would have been entitled to receive but for the record of his alleged desertion, deducting therefrom pay for absence of twenty-six days.

Mr. WEST. I beg leave to inquire how that bill got before the Senate? The morning business was closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By the Senator from Missouri asking unanimous consent to proceed with it, and no objection being made when the Chair called for objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. BOGY. I will explain the bill in a minute. This man was a soldier in the war, from my State. He served with great fidelity and great courage for some four years, or, perhaps, upward. While in the city of Mobile after the war had terminated for some time, he received a letter from home that his aged father was very sick and likely to die, and he asked permission to return. It was not given to him. He therefore left of his own accord, went home, buried his father, and returned to Mobile, and got there a day or two after his regiment had been mustered out of service. He has all the evidence of his officers of great courage and great fidelity, and was, indeed, one of the bravest and most faithful of our soldiers. There can be no doubt of the facts.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator has no objection, I should like to hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no written report with the papers.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPENCER] is confident that there is.

Mr. SPENCER. I made a written report in the case. The facts are substantially as stated by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better resume the consideration of the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio calls for the regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not object if there was a written report, so that it could be placed on the record to show exactly the ground on which the bill is based.

Mr. BOGY. I understand there is a written report. If so, let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk finds no report with the papers.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Missouri can see to it that the bill comes up at the next call of the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator calls for the regular order, which is Senate bill No. 432.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WRIGHT to the third section, which was to strike out "$25,000,000" and insert "$50,000,000," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the whole amount of circulation issued to such banking associations, and withdrawn and redeemed from banking associations, under the provisions of this act, shall not exceed $50,000,000.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON. I believe I had the floor when the Senate adjourned on Friday last, and I desire to offer an amendment to the bill before any further discussion takes place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator at the present time would not be in order, but he can have it read for information, and give notice that he will offer it.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania gives notice of his intention to offer an amendment, and desires it to be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That so much of the twenty-second section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, and so much of such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit or as may be construed to limit or restrict the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking under the provisions of said act shall be free to establish and organize national banks with circulation at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States upon the terms and conditions, and subject to all the limitations and restrictions, now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, in offering the substitute for the bill of the Committee on Finance, I am impelled by the highest considerations of public duty. The one point on which my mind is thoroughly convinced is, that there are not enough banking facilities now in this country to transact the stupendous business our enterprising people must and will transact. The irrepressible energy of the American people renders it certain that an immense amount of trade will be carried on. If money is to be had at fair prices it will be done with money. If not, then credit will be employed. This being assumed, and I think the assumption a safe one, it becomes our duty to decide whether the business of the country shall be safely conducted on adequate capital, properly secured, or wildly and dangerously done on overstrained credit. I do not consult antiquated theorists of a hundred years ago to determine whether we have, or have not, enough money for the business necessities of the country. The wisest of them no more comprehended the financial wants of to-day than they foresaw the present greatness of our nation. Being a practical man, I look upon things as I find them, and will insist on a system of finance which has proven beneficial to our people, even if this throws me in opposition to the conjectures of antiquity.

I have not yet heard any business man affirm that we have enough currency; but millions of men who represent the paralyzed industries of the country earnestly believe that we require more than we have now. The many who demand an increase of the circulating medium have long since come to denounce the banking interest, which it seems to be assumed here is opposed to that increase as a monopoly. I regret this, but I am not astonished at it. I remember the national banks gratefully for the good they have done, and I deem it a wise thing, if it be possible, to relieve them from this unjust aspersion. My purpose is to satisfy the demand for more money, and, at the same time, to do so without a shock to capital invested in good faith.

I entertain the opinion that there is too much profit in banking in the large cities and commercial centers for the good of the people at large; and my remedy for this evil is to more equally distribute the advantages of the national banking system throughout the country, and to provide borrowers with a supply of currency essential to their projects at a rate which leaves them some return for their enterprise and industry. This is secured, I think, by providing for such an increase of our present admirable bank-note currency as the interests of labor, of commerce, manufacturing, and of development generally, require, leaving the exact amount of the increase and the new banks to be established to be determined by the relentless law of supply and demand. By such a plan as increased banking facilities, under the safeguards of the national banking law, new banks will come into existence where the growth and development of the country, increased population, and the industrial interests of particular sections demand them. This is not inflation; it is merely supply. So, too, where the urgent necessity for money disappears and banking proves less profitable, the banks will retain their unemployed currency, or lend it at cheaper rates, until a revival of activity in trade again employs it at a profit. And this is not, properly speaking, contraction; it is simply the circulating medium adjusting itself to the wants of the country according to the experience and the business interests of the country. The tillers of the soil, the delvers in the mines, the transporters, merchants, manufacturers, and the traders of the country know better than Congress what they want; and this bill simply proposes to let them arrange it for themselves, in strict conformity with their necessities, and in localities of their own choice.

Let me try now to illustrate what these necessities are. About the 1st of September the crops of the West and South are ready for movement to the sea-board. To move them requires about $200,000,000; and this very large amount is required in money or other means of exchange beyond the wants of the summer. By the law as it now stands the amount of money is fixed. It can be no greater when the crops are harvested than when they are growing. It is well known that we have an abundance of money one part of the year and a famine the balance. Everybody knows this; and the men of Wall street arrange their "campaigns" on the sure recurrence of this financial fact, which repeats itself with inexorable certainty every autumn. This fixed and arbitrary currency is the terror of honest men and the jubilee of the speculators every year. The industrious and enterprising must have relief. The present limited number of banks cannot lend more than they are authorized and empowered to issue; and the greater number of them are too remote from the grain-growing regions to be useful to the farmers. Their depositors drain them at such times as these for the purposes of speculation and of realizing high rates for their money thus withdrawn. Distress and ruin follow as a matter of course, and are of annual recurrence. Now, my project aims at supplying the very elasticity which seems to be the only thing wanting to prevent this distress and ruin, and to make our system of currency perfect for our internal uses; and it also supplies that healthy competition which makes money available at fair rates of interest by multiplying the number of the national banks and increasing their power to extend relief in times of danger.

I think I may safely trust the Senate with the task of finding objections to this scheme, and shall therefore apply myself to noticing the advantages which I believe it to possess.

The first, and perhaps the greatest, advantage promised is the emancipation of the business of the people from the rigid compression of our restrictive financial system, so admirable in everything but its inflexibility. Enterprising capitalists are permitted to organize banks under the authority and the sanction of national charters, thus attracting capitalt to the aid of the business necessities of the country. It authorizes the necessary increase of the currency in exact ratio as it is required, and it spreads over the whole country the benefits of banking facilities. Thus you at once make the currency elastic, and bring the facilities needed by the producers to their doors, which they are now forced to procure at a great distance; and you localize the national banks, with their advantages, by distributing them over all the land.

On the advantages of this proposed multiplication and diffusion of national banks I need not dwell, I trust. But some pointed benefits result from it, and are worthy of your attention.

In the cities or commercial and financial centers money is less needed than in the agricultural or producing regions. In the former all transactions of importance are conducted by the use of bank-checks. In the rural districts, on the contrary, the laborer, mechanic, and producer must have currency, and the employer can only satisfy them by the payment of bank-notes, checks being useless to meet the small wants of every-day life. To keep these currency notes where they are needed, and to restrain them from flowing to where they are mainly used in speculation, or locked up by parties engaged in raising or depressing the price of produce, should be the aim of all who desire to cure existing evils. To secure this most desirable end the existence of collecting and distributing agents is essentially necessary, and the banks I seek to authorize will be the very agency demanded by the exigencies of industry, and will be located precisely where their important duties are to be performed.

Another benefit secured by the substitute I offer is, that the currency which forms the principal medium of business is made safer by the increase in the number of country banks. The reports of the Comptroller of the Currency will show that the safeguards provided by law for the public are more generally and faithfully observed by the rural than by the city banks. That provision of the national banking law which requires a reserveto be kept in the vaults for the security of note-holders and depositors was more conscientiously obeyed everywhere in the country than in the cities, and in the fourteen great cities, denominated by the Department "cities of redemption," than in New York. The gross amount of reserve required of the country banks under the law to protect their liabilities was, on the 12th of September, 1873, about a week before the panic came, $80,000,665. They actually held on that day $110,110,455, an excess of more than $30,000,000 over the legal requirements. The banks in the fourteen great cities (excluding New York) were required to have in their vaults $67,291,175, and they actually held $68,095,598, being three-tenths of 1 per cent. more than required; while the banks of New York City, which were required by law to have $50,263,741, had only $46,864,341, or nearly $5,000,000 less security than the law demanded.

Thus you will see that the least measure of security exists at the great center of speculation; complete compliance with the law in the other marts of trade, as a whole; but an ample and generous excess in the rural banks. Hence it was that the business public saw at once that the country banks would have had no difficulty in continuing the transaction of their legitimate business, and affording all proper accommodations, and meeting all their liabilities; while the city banks immediately upon the puncture of the speculative bubble, having their means to a great extent beyond their reach, and therefore not available, were obliged to succumb to the storm they had, in many instances, helped to raise. There were but few national banks in the country that could not and did not meet the demands of their depositors; and the few that found it necessary to ask a few days' indulgence from their customers were such as had an undue proportion of their assets intrusted to the keeping of the banks in the financial centers, and so placed beyond their reach until the city banks could extricate themselves from their embarrassments.

Another excellence in the system I seek to extend has been abundantly shown during the last financial troubles. In former times the first thing the holder of a bank-note thought of doing when financial disaster overtook the country was to get rid of his note, to exchange it for anything, in the fear that it would prove to be worthless on his hands. The consequence was that the value of everything sympathized with the distrust of the holder of the bank-note. Now, however, we have seen that the one thing which everybody considers the most secure and reliable property, excepting only United States bonds, is the national-bank note. And it cannot be a dangerous scheme to supply the country generously with a currency far superior to any we have ever enjoyed in the past, and superior even to the timidity and alarm of a financial revulsion. In this connection, and before taking leave of this part of the subject, I desire to record my opinion that our present currency is more convenient than a metallic currency and equally safe for all the uses of our internal needs; is better adapted for making exchanges; is easier and cheaper to transport; and is very much safer for custody than any metallic currency whatever.

I now come to consider a proposition which I fear will present itself to the minds of Senators as a paradox. I hold that increasing the national banks will enable the United States to resume specie payments sooner than by any other process. Every national bank organized, and all hereafter to be organized, must by law keep up a reserve for the security of the public and its immediate customers. This reserve must be mainly in United States notes, now considered, and justly considered, the chief obstruction to the resumption of specie payments. It is certain, therefore, that by the increase of banks these notes will be absorbed in the bank reserves, and become a fixture in the vaults of the banks, disappearing altogether from circulation except for the transactions of the business of the Government, which recognizes no other currency in its dealings with its citizens.

The figures I lately read to describe the comparative condition of the banks when the panic came will show you that this absorption is already greater than many believe, and is greater, I fear, than many financiers estimate. This will go on until the new banks take up a large proportion of the United States notes which the old banks have not already absorbed; and these greenbacks will eventually be held by the banks, in strict conformity with law, as the collateral security for their circulation and deposits. The moment the Treasury escapes the danger of a run upon it for the redemption of the greenbacks in specie the Government can announce its resumption. The question therefore comes up, "Will the absorption of the Treasury notes by the banks, as indicated, protect the Treasury from a demand for their redemption in coin?" I unhesitatingly answer that it will afford a complete protection against such a demand, in my judgment. When the banks find themselves the possessors of the greenback circulation, they hold the precise thing in which their own notes are redeemable by law. The fact that the Treasury has resumed, and is paying specie, will be of no consequence to them; for the same qualities which make paper superior to gold in the hands of others has greater force with institutions forced to incur the risk of keeping large amounts of valuable property in their custody. To this it may be objected that this plan assumes the irredeemable character of the Treasury notes and treats their redemption as immaterial. A little reflection will remove so hasty a conclusion. When the time comes for resumption, the power of the Government will be absolute over the whole subject of the redemption or the cancellation of these notes. Then the promises to pay can be changed for gold gradually, surely, arbitrarily. While the banks may be satisfied with the Treasury notes, the Government may desire to redeem them at its pleasure, and the banks cannot help themselves. The time will come, and more speedily than many imagine, when the Government will desire to pay and cancel her notes, and then require the banks to redeem their circulation in coin. And such a requirement will not injure the national banks; for such is the excellence of our present paper currency that no man thinks of looking at a bill to see what bank issues it. The consequence of this unquestioning confidence is that the notes of our banks are scattered all over the land, and are equally good everywhere in the land. So difficult is it to obtain enough notes on any particular bank to distress it by a demand for specie, that any danger from that source is not to be seriously considered. In fact, we are not left to theorize over this point. When a bank fails now, it can only repossess itself of the bonds owned by it and held by the Treasurer as security for its circulation by a return to the proper officer of its own notes; and procuring these scattered notes is so difficult, that broken-bank bills are advertised for, without success, at a premium as high in some cases as 5 per cent. above par. Thus the protection afforded by our law is ample in every respect, and I urge the safety, the policy, the necessity, of increasing the facilities secured by this admirable system.

In so ardently commending an increase of banking privileges it seems to be proper for me to notice a vulgar prejudice, fostered by demagogues, to the effect that national banks are specially favored by law in exemption from taxation while engaged in a profitable business, and that they also enjoy immunity from taxation while drawing interest on bonds owned by them and deposited with the United States Treasurer as the basis of their business. In the first place, these bonds were issued for money actually loaned to the Government, and they would bear interest whether owned by a bank or any one else. And, secondly, the banks do actually pay back in taxes very nearly all the interest their bonds draw. I have the authority of official data for affirming that the aggregate of taxes paid by the national banks is 4½ per cent. on their capital. They hold $380,440,700 in bonds to secure circulation and nearly $16,000,000 to secure the United States deposits made with them. But the first item is the one I have to deal with. This $380,440,700 is made up of $172,651,450 at 6 per cent, and $207,189,250 at 5 per cent. The annual interest paid to them amounts to $20,718,549.50, and the taxes paid by them is very nearly $18,000,000 a year. Since the organization of the national banks in 1864, to January 1, 1874, they have paid to the Federal and State governments a sum largely exceeding $100,000,000. In other words, these reviled banks, charged with evading taxation, have paid this immense sum in taxes for the support of Government. It will be observed that the bonds bearing 6 per cent., now owned by the banks, are reduced to $172,651,400. All the residue are 5 per cents; and in the organization of future banks the 5 per cents. are the only bonds available for that purpose, the 6 per cents being now all absorbed. As the taxes are 4½ per cent., it can be readily seen that the profits of the banks for interest on their bonds is not likely to reach any startling figure. So much for that contemptible piece of perversion; and let it pass.

The hurry with which I have been forced to prepare my views for presentation has prevented that extended and elaborate reflection demanded alike by the importance of the subject in hand and those to whom my opinions are submitted. But I cannot forego one more point to which I invite careful attention.

Opening the way for more banking facilities will retire the greenbacks, and their place must be filled by national-bank notes. This means eventually, and in legitimate supply for the constantly increasing business of the country, a circulation of, say, $850,000,000 against about $750,000,000 now in use.

The bonds requisite for security, and as the basis of such a volume of currency, will aggregate $1,000,000,000, mainly at 5 per cent., 4½ per cent. of which will be paid back in taxes by the banks. Here, then, you have more than one-half the bonded debt of the country really carried by the banks as a tribute for the privileges conferred on them, and so virtually removed from the burdens of the people. And this, too, coming to relieve a population which is constantly increasing its numbers and wealth, and consequently its ability to meet the burdens of a great national debt. While the country is growing up to the debt, the debt is provided for by a system of finance worth more than the billion dollars on which it is based, and yet taking the charge of the annual interest accruing on this great sum. And when the last billion of our indebtedness comes to be paid, it will be found to be employed for a purpose which provides for its annual charge effectually, while securing, at the same time, a currency of inestimable value to the country, of primary importance to its steady growth, reposing in the confidence of all, and enabling our country to pursue its legitimate internal affairs with a complete independence of all influences capable of retarding or obstructing the healthy development of any section, and securing the good of all the people.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, amid the many clashing theories we have in respect to the financial problem, no man may fear to submit a plan of his own. It was said on Friday by my friend from Pennsylvania, in the course of his remarks, that no three men are to be found who agree with three other men on this question. Therefore it is that while counting myself the least capable member of this body to give advice on so delicate and complicated a question, I venture to express a few views, not so much with the expectation of influencing others as to show the reasons that govern the votes I shall give upon the present and future questions as they shall arise.

So far as I am capable of generalizing the opinions of Senators from what has occurred here in debate, I think this body may be grouped into three classes: first, those who, if not wholly satisfied with our existing currency, are satisfied to drift along without change; next, those who would improve it by taking measures to make it convertible at an early day into gold and silver; and, lastly, those who, seeing no hope of early resumption, and feeling the necessity of more money, would increase the present volume, either by national-bank notes, or greenbacks, or both. All these theories have found their advocates on this floor.

I think I may say of those holding these several opinions that they are all agreed upon one thing—that the best condition of currency would be, if attainable, a mixed circulation of paper money, and gold and silver, the paper being convertible at any time, at the will of the holder, into the precious metals.

I think we are all agreed upon another proposition—that our present paper currency is, in all respects but one, the very best that the country ever had. It lacks, indeed, but a single element of being perfect, and that is found in the fact that it is not convertible at par into gold and silver. Steadily has it approached the gold standard, now receding for a brief while, and then again advancing, once reaching it within 7 per cent., but now standing at 11 per cent. discount. Most heartily do I sympathize with those who would make the paper dollar the peer of the gold dollar. Gladly would we all hail the day when that instability in prices should cease which must always exist while the paper currency varies from the gold standard and rises and falls like quicksilver in the barometer, and from causes so subtle and recondite that no man may predict its quotation on the morrow.

But while we must all agree that the perfect equality between paper and gold would leave us nothing to desire in our financial condition, we cannot shut our eyes to what must befall the country should an attempt be made now to bring around specie payments. Consider, sir, the vast paper fabric we have reared, amounting to $750,000,000. Let the fiat go forth that the United States will begin the redemption of its notes a year hence, or two years, and what would be the effect? This money is distributed among forty-one millions of people, and its purchasing power would increase steadily as the day of redemption approached. The holders could make money by letting it lie idle in their hands. It would, consequently, grow dearer and harder to acquire. Those in debt would be driven to desperate efforts to acquire it, while it would yet be a legal tender and answer the purposes of gold.

In the mean time what would be the course of the banks? Their outstanding notes redeemable in greenbacks or gold are nearly equal to one-half the paper currency. In view of the necessity of redemption, they would draw in their debts and curtail their discounts and loans. What we saw last fall during the panic, when the question was, not how they should redeem their notes, but how they should pay their depositors, would be repeated. They must shorten sail and prepare for the storm.

What, then, would be the combined effect of these causes upon the industries of the country? It needs no prophet to foretell the universal paralysis that must fall upon every form of productive industry. I might go into details to show the modus operandi, but every man can see for himself.

Few people in the western country have the capital accumulated to carry on manufacturing enterprises. They depend upon the banks to loan them money, and to discount the paper of the customers to whom they sell. Money must be had to lay in the raw material, to pay the hands and current expenses, or the factory must stop operations. Others who buy up the cattle and hogs, the wheat and corn, of the farmers, must have large amounts of money. But where is this to be had, if the banks, in a spirit of self-preservation, refuse to put afloat their notes, which they will soon be required to redeem at their counters in gold? Of course prices must fall. Those who would in ordinary times, in cities, villages, and the country, make outlays of money in building factories, houses, and barns, and in improving and extending their farms, must postpone all enterprises of the kind until better times. The blow would thus fall first and heaviest upon the mechanics and laboring men. Here, again, we may draw an instructive lesson from what occurred last fall. There are thousands of men this winter out of employment in the cities and villages all over the land from the scarcity of money. Scarcity is hardly the word, for the money is all in the country; but is held back from that general employment in which it benefited the lender and borrower before the panic.

Thus, sir, imperfectly have I sketched what would result in case Congress attempted at this time an early resumption of specie payments. The consequences would be too disastrous to attempt it. Consider for a moment its effect upon the debtor class. If I owe a debt of $1,000 I could discharge it now with $900 in gold, and my creditor would lose nothing by the operation. How would it be a year hence, if at that time specie payments must begin? It would require $1,000 in gold then, besides the interest accrued. At present prices of crops and property a given amount of wheat, or corn, or pork, or horses, or cattle will pay the debt. But a year hence it may require a fourth or third or one-half more of the same property to pay the debt, if specie payments are precipitated. While the creditor would grow rich in the operation, the debtor would be ruined. Constables' and sheriffs' notices of sales would be found posted up at every cross-roads and every tavern and blacksmith shop over the country. Millions of property must change hands at ruinous sacrifices in adjusting the differences between the creditor and debtor. If money were to be had at all, it would be only at frightfully usurious rates, overwhelming the victim at last. We should have abundant use, sir, then, for the bankrupt law we have been so carefully improving.

How would it affect the mercantile class? First, it would depreciate the value of their stocks; next it would arrest their sales; then they in turn must apply the screw to their customers, in order to pay their own debts and save themselves from bankruptcy. Thus every farmer and mechanic and common laborer who has obtained credit at the stores or groceries for supplies for his family, must pay his bills or be sued, and run the risk of having his little property sold under the hammer. What all these classes of debtors need, and must have to arrest ruin, is money; and where, sir, is the money to be obtained to serve such a legion of borrowers?

Mr. President, if the picture I draw be true, or half true, we could put no law or resolution on the statute-book which would cause such universal distress and ruin to the prosperity of the counrry as a forced resumption of specie payments at this time or any other time near at hand.

I have no hesitation, therefore, as to my duty in voting against every scheme looking to resumption at this time. I regard it as visionary and impracticable. For twelve years past we have had no use for gold in the ordinary exchanges of the country, and as a consequence there is very little of it here, not exceeding $150,000,000 in the whole country. The merchant needs it to pay his duties at the custom-house, the importer to pay the difference between what he imports and what he exports, and the Government needs it to pay the interest upon the public debt. If gold be necessary for any other purpose I do not know what it is, unless to pay the representatives of our Government in foreign countries their salaries, and to defray the expenses of those who every year in great numbers visit the Old World. From all I can learn we send abroad to pay interest and the balance of trade against us more gold than we produce from our mines or than comes to us through immigration. How, then, should we inaugurate resumption except by borrowing the gold? And in what market could we obtain the amount necessary to begin and maintain specie payments?

What said the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] in this debate, the other day, on this head? I have his remarks here before me, and as I regard everything that falls from that gentleman's lips as good authority on this question, I beg leave to read a short extract:

> The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] have each introduced a bill, the substantive parts of which, as far I desire to deal with the bills, are the same. The Government is to borrow gold in the markets of the world with which to redeem the outstanding legal-tender notes. There are two facts within our own observation that bear upon this proposition, one of them known to everybody, and the other known to me as an officer of the Government. When the negotiations were going on in London for the sale of the largest amount of United States bonds that had ever been sold there at one time, it was foreseen by the Bank of England that a quantity of coin would accumulate as the proceeds of these bonds to the credit of the Government of the United States. As a matter of fact there was an accumulation of about $21,000,000. The Bank of England, foreseeing that there would be an accumulation of coin to the credit of the United States which might be taken away bodily in specie, gave notice to the officers of the Treasury Department of the United States that the power of that institution would be arrayed against the whole proceeding unless we gave a pledge that the coin should not be removed, and that we would reinvest it in the bonds of the United States as they were offered in the markets of London. We were compelled to do it. It was in the interest of the Government that we should do it, because we did not want the coin, and we did want the bonds. But it shows the feeling that animates that central financial power of Great Britain, and it shows a policy on the part of that institution, and of every kindred institution on the continent of Europe, sustained by all the banking and commercial classes, by which, if it were necessary and this proposition should become a law, the bonds of the United States would be excluded from the stock markets of every financial city. There are in the nine great banks of Europe only $600,000,000 in specie. That specie is held as a reserve with reference to their local business and with reference to the great transactions that take place between the countries of the continent of Europe and Great Britain. I may say, without disparaging the authors of these propositions, that it is useless for Congress to waste time upon legislation looking in that direction.

Looking in the direction of borrowing gold for the purpose of resuming specie payments. That is the honorable Senator's doctrine.

> There is another fact, known to all. We recovered at Geneva an award against Great Britain of $15,500,000. When this claim was maturing the banking and commercial classes of Great Britain induced the government to interpose, and by diplomatic arrangements through the State Department here, operating upon the Treasury Department, secured the transfer of securities and thus avoided the transfer of coin. In the presence of these facts, is it to be assumed for a moment that we can go into the markets of the world and purchase coin with which we can redeem one, two, three, or four hundred million outstanding legal-tender notes?

Now, sir, with that quotation from the honorable Senator, who a short time since was at the head of the Treasury Department, I leave that branch of the question. I dismiss this plan here, which has found so many advocates, as impracticable, wholly impracticable, in my judgment.

As to the next plan, which is content with the present condition, looking neither to resumption nor inflation, all I have to say may be said in the consideration of the third plan, of which the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] have been the conspicuous advocates.

I am free to say that if at this late day it were practicable I should be glad to see one uniform paper currency; and my preference would be the greenbacks. They have the supreme virtue of being Government money. They bind the faith of the nation as strong as do our much vaunted bonds. They repose for ultimate redemption upon the wealth and express pledge of the nation. They are the promises of the nation, indeed, to pay the holders gold; not to-day, not next year, not for many years, perhaps, but at some time, and whenever the good faith of the nation may be kept without destroying the prosperity of those who hold its notes. The people who hold the greenbacks are the debtors who must ultimately pay them. It is not the people, sir, who are clamoring for payment of these notes at this time. Well do they understand that they must pay them in burdensome taxes, and that they will lose more than they gain in the operation. They read upon the back of every United States note its power in discharging public and private debts. They know there is not a tax imposed, except customs duties, which it will not pay. They know that no creditor may refuse to receive it in discharge of the debts they owe. They know there is no species of property measured by money which it will not buy. They know that in all this broad land, from ocean to ocean, from the Saint Lawrence and the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, it has equal value, and everywhere buys what they want and pays what they contract for. They know it cannot fail on their hands, or essentially diminish in value, while this nation endures an honest, thrifty people. Being a debt they owe to themselves, they will take good care that it shall not fail.

So good a currency as this, it were desirable, as I said, should be the exclusive currency and take the place of the national-bank notes. But that I agree is an impracticable scheme at this time. These notes possess most of the functions of the greenbacks. In one important respect they do not; they are not a legal tender in payment of private debts. Hitherto, however, they have been regarded as equal, or nearly so, to their elder brother. The bank which issues them promises to redeem them in gold or greenbacks. This it must do upon presentation or go into liquidation.

Now, sir, that the privilege of banking is a most valuable franchise at this time when the limit of issue has been reached has been abundantly shown in this debate, in the proposition to withdraw from the banks in the States having the greatest circulation twenty-five millions, according to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, and fifty millions, according to the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, for distribution in those States in the South, West, and Southwest, having less than their proper quota. If sturdy fighting for the bone they have and others crave ever deserved success, I am sure the sympathies of disinterested lookers-on will be with those who are in possession in this battle for privileges. But wherefore should united New England and New York resist this transfer if the employment by them of this twenty-five millions circulation going abroad on gainful errands to distant regions, and coming back loaded like the thrify bee, is not a valuable franchise to be retained?

Much has been said in this debate about the injustice of the present distribution of the national-bank circulation. I do not care to enter into that question. Every Senator seems to agree that it is a good thing, one much to be desired, to have the privilege from the Comptroller of the Currency of establishing these national banks in his own State. All this proves, if it proves anything, that the present system, restricted as it is to an issue of $354,000,000, is a monopoly, or has become one by reaching the limit of issue. Now, if there be any one thing more hateful to the American mind than another, or to anything else, it is a chartered privilege. In this case a privilege of making money by banking is restricted to a certain number of associations, and therefore not enjoyable on equal terms by other associations of citizens. It is, therefore, objected that the men who have preoccupied the ground and absorbed all the bank circulation allowed by law have a monopoly of the business. What this monopoly amounts to may be seen by any one who is curious on the subject by reading the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, to which I will allude before taking my seat.

Some of these banks, under favorable circumstances, have paid enormous dividends. Take them all in all and there are no more desirable stocks. They are close corporations, and it is hard for an outsider to get in.

Well, sir, without going into nice theories about how much money is needed by forty-one million people, industrious and enterprising like the American people, and rapidly growing in wealth and population, I have come to this conclusion: if our present banking system amounts to a monopoly, and our banks are making too large gains upon their capital, let us break up the monopoly; let us remove the bar which limits the circulation to three hundred and fifty-four millions; nay, let us go further, and allow all citizens of the United States to enter into this business upon the same terms and conditions imposed upon existing banks. Let every association of persons willing to buy our 5 per cent. funded bonds deposit them with the United States Treasurer, and receive 90 per cent. of their par value in bank-notes, and go to banking upon an equal footing with the banks already established, having the same privileges, and subject to the same duties and liabilities. Thus, sir, the supply of paper currency will always equal the demand; thus every section of the country having the capital to organize a bank can have one of these pets in its midst; thus money will be abundant, and therefore cheap, and the whole vast machinery of industry will be put in motion.

Nor will the bill-holder be worse off than now, for he will have the same guarantees as at present. He will have for his security the bonds pledged; the whole assets of the banks, the personal liability of the stockholders, and upon all these the guarantee of the United States against loss.

Sir, this plan does not possess the merit of novelty by any means. But it has the merit of being a plain, straight-forward plan which every one can understand and take in at a glance.

The objections are obvious enough, and I shall not be at the trouble of combating them at this time. But we have got to choose between this and the strait-jacket plan if we disturb the currency at all. Now, I can scarce state an argument or fact in this connection which will not be combated by somebody, and that is the real difficulty we have in touching the financial question. What I do, however, set forth as a fact is, that periodically there is a stringency in the money market, a great stringency, when more money is needed than can be had. This state of things has been observed for many years, and even in seasons of great prosperity. It occurs generally when the enormous crops of the country are being purchased and moved to market. It takes a great many millions of money to buy and move these products, and for the time being the money centers are depleted and the money enters into general circulation, and the banks are in no condition to make loans.

Now, sir, without entering into further elaboration, I have come to the conclusion that I cannot better further the views of the people I have the honor in part to represent here than by supporting that specific measure. They want, or think they want, more money. They want an elastic currency. That, perhaps, is not the best form of expression; but they want one which shall be proportioned, or is capable of being proportioned, to their needs from time to time. They want a uniform currency equally valuable in all parts of the country, and as amply secured as that we now have. They want the banks which shall supply this currency located near their own doors, where they can obtain bank accommodations as they need them. I can think of no plan which secures all these ends so effectually as free banking.

That system has been tried in several of the States, and when well guarded, as in the State of New York, has worked well. Indeed it was owing to this successful experiment that it was adopted by Congress as a national system in 1863. When New York in 1838 first established the system of free banking, the currency was secured in part by the stocks of the different States and in part by bonds and mortgages deposited by the banks with the State controller. The law was, however, ultimately so changed that the circulation was entirely secured by the bonds of the United States and the State of New York; and this was the condition of free banking in the State at the time the rebellion occurred. I do not remember that under that perfected system the bill-holder ever lost a dollar. If I am wrong in this the Senator from New York at my left will correct me.

Mr. FENTON. There was no loss.

Mr. PRATT. Free banking was authorized by the constitution of Indiana adopted in 1851. The very next year an act passed authorizing and regulating the business of general banking. Numerous banks were organized under this law. The vice in the system consisted in allowing the banking associations to deposit as security for the redemption of their circulating notes the stocks of any of the States which paid interest semi-annually at six per cent. upon their public debt, and in allowing to the banks a circulation equal to the par or market value of the stocks. The law was not well guarded in other respects, and soon afterward there occurred a great depreciation in the value of the stocks deposited, and in the forced sales made great losses occurred to the banks, and in some cases to the bill-holders.

Illinois had a similar law, and similar results happened there. Had the system in these States been carefully guarded, as in New York or under the present national banking law, the bill-holder would never have lost a dollar, and it would have become in time the most popular form of banking in the West. In 1857 came the general suspension of specie payments. But for two years before that the free banks were preyed upon by brokers, who assorted their notes and made a regular business of running on them for specie. But this state of things could never have existed if greenbacks had been in existence, and the banks could then as now have exercised the option of redeeming in them or in gold. This greenback intermediary is the solution of the difficulty. By law the paper dollar is made the unit of value equally with gold. And, sir, so long as people are willing to take the venture of organizing banks under the conditions of the existing law, and are willing to incur the risk of finding greenbacks or gold to redeem their notes as fast as they are presented for payment at their counters or at some redemption point, I am willing they shall have the privilege of banking.

I spoke a little while since of the profits made during the last ten years by the banks. Why, sir, they have not only divided 10 per cent. upon their capital, but accumulated a surplus of about one hundred and twenty millions for future division among the stockholders.

On the 1st of September last there were nineteen hundred and fifty-five national banks, having a capital of $488,000,000, and during the period of six months ending on that day their earnings were $33,120,000, while their dividends for six months, mark you, amounted to nearly twenty-five millions. They have made similar dividends from the beginning—greater heretofore than now. They have done this notwithstanding the taxes they have paid upon their circulation, deposits, and capital. These taxes amounted for the year 1872 to within a fraction of seven millions. From 1864 to 1872, inclusive, the taxes paid by the banks amounted to forty-seven millions.

One word more while I am on this subject. These profits have been mainly realized from the customers of the banks; wholly so I believe, except as to the interest they have collected on their deposited bonds. Now, sir, consider how much money belonging to the banks cannot be used. They must maintain their specie and greenback reserves. The Comptroller informs us in his last report that the banks hold an average reserve of more than one hundred millions of legal-tender notes, equivalent to a loan to the Government to that extent without interest. They also hold of United States bonds, purchased at a premium, over forty-two million in excess of circulation issued, which they are required by law to keep on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, and on which large amount they receive nothing of profit except the interest, 5 or 6 per cent., which the bonds draw. And yet with all these drawbacks they are able to divide 10 per cent. profits among the stockholders, and have been able to accumulate a surplus of one hundred and twenty millions for future division—nearly 25 per cent. of their capital.

And now, sir, after submitting these statements, drawn from a source no one will venture to question, I may fittingly close by asking, why shall not this monopoly cease? Why should we not leave the business of issuing bank-notes to the operation of the law of supply and demand? Why should we, from fear of undue inflation, deny to others a privilege which seems so right? Who shall venture to affirm that the business will not regulate itself, and the banks retire their circulation and redeem their bonds whenever there is an excess of money? Who, in view of the stimulus which abundant money will give to every enterprise, to the development of the country, and the million hands it will furnish employment to with remunerative wages, will hesitate from fear of possible disaster? Secured as the money will be, may we not trust to the sagacity and judgment of capital that there will be no overbanking when the business will not pay? Under all circumstances will we not be secure against unreasonable inflation in the fact that the greenback issue will remain fixed where it is, and the bank currency must be redeemed in greenbacks or gold? Greenbacks cannot depreciate while they are constantly in demand for this redemption, but must rather appreciate as they become relatively scarce and the demand for them increases as the bank currency is multiplied.

I add a word more to allay the fears of those who apprehend undue expansion when all restrictions are removed. The last fifty-four million, authorized three years ago, has not all been taken up yet. But a more striking fact yet remains to be stated. Our present paper circulation of all kinds exceeds by three and a half times the bank issues of all the States before the war, including those States where free banking prevailed. There was no limit in New York, Indiana, or Illinois to the organization of banks or the paper currency they were authorized to put in circulation upon the condition of the deposit of public stocks. And yet, sir, at the time of the greatest inflation I do not think the paper circulation of all the States combined equaled one-half our present volume of paper currency.

Now, sir, while these are my convictions, I shall vote for every proposition increasing the bank circulation as the next best thing to free banking. I shall most heartily vote for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON;] doubting, however, at the same time whether Congress is yet prepared to embrace the views I have presented. No one more ardently desires a return to specie payments than I do. But I cannot shut my eyes to two facts: the impossibility of resumption except by a contraction which would bring disaster upon the country, and that other great fact which it is impossible to ignore, that under an irredeemable paper currency, varying from seven hundred to seven hundred and fifty million, the country has attained a prosperity, not fictitious but real, greater by far than at any period of our history. Argue and refine as gentlemen may, here is a stubborn fact which confounds all their theories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have no sympathy with the partisan spirit of this debate. This rallying of the West and South and of the North and East, this calling upon the friends of contraction and the friends of expansion to stand by their respective policy, is anything but commendable. I believe we are considering one of the most momentous questions ever presented to the American Congress; and while I assume that all feel on this subject the responsibility that I do, I submit we should treat these questions with calm deliberation and without party feeling; that we should consider the interest not of a section, but of the whole country, and have regard, not to the cry of the hour, but to the permanent good of the life-time of the nation.

We now, in a most unusual manner, have submitted to us a proposition revolutionizing the whole finances of the country. It is an entire surprise; and its effects are as far-reaching as its origin is sudden, and it comes from no committee. On Friday the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] and his equally earnest and able coadjutor from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] were urging the Senate to come up to the point of increasing our currency forty-six millions, and now the proposition is made, and Senators have already avowed themselves in its favor, of creating a volume of circulation that has no limit to its amount. No limit did I say? I am wrong; every finite thing has a limit, and the limit placed upon this issue of irredeemable paper money is $1,722,000,000, or, rather, 90 per cent. upon that amount as a basis of currency.

Mr. President, I submit the Committee on Finance should have this whole subject again committed to it. They have now heard the views expressed by Senators from different parts of the country; they have had time for consideration, and we have a right to look to them for a matured plan in reference to this entire subject.

If we take one step at this crisis in our national finances in the wrong direction, our course is downward until we recover at a fearful cost.

I suppose it will hardly be disputed that if we increase the paper money of the country, whether in legal-tenders or in currency, we by so doing increase the difference between paper money and gold; that as we multiply our promises to pay our ability to pay with the gold at our command is lessened; and, therefore, I submit that this proposition to increase the currency is a direct violation of the pledge Congress gave on the 18th of March, 1869, that we would make our United States notes convertible into coin. The language of the pledge is this:

> The United States solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Now, sir, if we propose to increase the volume of our currency without limit, excepting the limit of 90 per cent. on seventeen hundred and twenty-two millions of bonds as a basis, we are not "at the earliest practicable period" taking measures to redeem those notes in coin, but we are making provision for doing the very contrary. The pledge, the honor of a single man, binds him with cords of iron. He swears to his hurt and changes not; and what should be the "solemn pledge," in the language of the resolution, of forty millions of people? It should be as irrefragable as a law of nature. Barbarians, it has been said, give a whiff of tobacco and exchange a string of beads, and that gives their promise not only a binding force, but gives it sanctity; and shall this nation trample under its feet its solemn pledge? If morality, sir, does not constrain us to keep the pledge, policy should induce us to do so; because for the next quarter of a century we must necessarily be in the market as borrowers of money, and we will be obliged to pay in the increased rates of interest the penalty for thus trifling with our plighted faith.

Take this step, and we render our currency still more fluctuating than it now is; we render it unfit to be the standard for the measurement of values in all our contracts and business transactions, and we thus injure and discourage all our business interests. Take this step, and we are rendering our currency permanently provincial; so that the gold currents of the world, with their healthful expansion, will never visit us. Take this step, and we damage our commerce; we consign this Republic to a second or third place among the nations of the world.

No one should doubt that if we adopt this measure the wildest speculation will follow. It must follow. The speculator, with his $30,000 in bonds, organizes a bank; he gets interest on his deposit; has his securities carefully cared for at the risk of the Government, and he has 90 per cent. in circulation furnished him. He will use this currency, not for the benefit of those who are engaged in healthful business, but to bolster up those engaged with him in wild speculation. And further, sir, experience shows that wherever a nation has entered upon a system of irredeemable paper currency the cry is for more; and when the bonds are exhausted we shall be called upon to make stocks and land a basis for banking. This is already foreshadowed by the speech of the Senator from Indiana in his allusion to the free-banking law of New York.

The proposition for unlimited free banking with irredeemable paper money, I submit, is without any parallel. The law of New York has been alluded to. It is true that free banking existed there based upon stocks and upon real estate security; but there was this essential, broad, and all-comprehending difference between that system and this: there, when a bill was presented at the counter, it must be paid in gold or the bank must at once go into the hands of a receiver, and be placed in liquidation.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend will allow me to suggest that there was another very great difference. There never was free banking in the State of New York in any sense implied by the Senator from Indiana. There was banking upon the condition inexorable that notes should always be redeemable in gold, as the Senator from New Jersey has said, and that circulation thus redeemable was always secured, and secured in such a way as to graduate, gauge, and limit its volume. There must be a certain proportion of the stocks of the State of New York, which stocks, besides being at a great premium, were fixed and definite, limited in amount. I say limited, because the quantity was only of a certain measure, and there could never be an increase—so the constitution said—except by a vote of the people of New York, permitting an increase of the State debt. Thus the Senator from New Jersey will see that he has a double warrant for his denial that free banking, as now understood, prevailed in the State of New York.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, Mr. President, if a proposition were made here to have free banking, which required that the notes should on presentation be paid in gold, with a fixed limit as to the amount of notes that should be issued, I do not know that I should oppose it. But under the proposition submitted the bank must redeem, in what? Why, in irredeemable paper, that bears no interest, and which Congress has given but too clear indication it does not intend to pay. And if the banks do not redeem, even in these inconvertible United States notes, what is the consequence? Then the bill-holder waits—waits until the bills scattered among forty millions of people are gathered together, and after enough of them have been accumulated, the bonds are sold, and the bill-holder gets his dividend, be it more or less. The depositor has no security and gets nothing. The speculating bank-owner receives deposits. This is nothing more nor less than a loan without personal liability. The depositor has the liability of the bank, and nothing more. When that refuses to pay he must submit. And we, by this legislation, are providing means by which depositors may be defrauded by the thousand irresponsible banks thus to be created.

Mr. President, I said there was no parallel for this proposition. I was wrong; there is one parallel. In 1789, during the revolution, France found herself in want of money and issued assignats, paper promises based upon the property of the clergy and of emigrants that had been seized for sale. For three years that paper stood at 90 per cent. The issue was increased, and this paper fell to 60 per cent. Then, in 1795, it fell to 18 per cent., and then, as Carlyle says in his French Revolution, there was no trade whatever for the time being; "assignats, long sinking, now emitted in such quantities, sink with an alacrity without parallel." If you asked a hackman what was his fare, he answered "Six thousand livres," or about $1,500; and Carlyle further says that everybody was engaged in wild speculation; the very farm-houses of the country were turned into pawnbroker shops until that system brought the land to national bankruptcy.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Does the Senator remember the maximum amount of that issue?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The first amount issued was 1,200,000,000 francs. The maximum amount I do not remember. It was very large.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will remind the Senator that the maximum amount was 45,000,000,000 francs, about $9,000,000,000 of our money.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Whether the amount of irredeemable paper be $9,000,000,000 or $1,722,000,000, is of little consequence, as either the one or the other amount would ruin either nation.

Mr. PRATT. Does my friend from New Jersey remember that about one thousand millions of our bonds are used at this time, and more cannot be very conveniently got to be used for the purposes of banking?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it must be a poor system which within an hour after it is promulgated needs the apology that all the evil it is calculated to produce will not, because of some fortuitous circumstance, be realized. It may be that some of the securities are at present beyond the reach of speculators, but our bonds can as well be procured in Europe as here for the speculating purposes of this measure.

Sir, we should hesitate long before, by following such a precedent as that I have stated, we work disaster to commerce, injury to business, and bankruptcy to the nation. I believe that the adoption of this measure, as it has been promulgated here this morning, will be an injury to the financial and business interests of the country little less serious than was the rebellion. If you want free banking, with similar restrictions to those imposed in New York, you have it already. In the third, fourth, and fifth sections of the act of July 12, 1870, ample provision is made for free banking with the notes redeemable in coin.

I have one more word to say. As it is true that if we take one step in the wrong direction it will be followed by disaster, so it is true that if we take one step in the right direction, be it ever so short a step or ever so tardy in reaching the point, the finances of the country are safe.

I have no hesitation in stating the measures which in my opinion, should be adopted.

In the first place, the expenditures of the Government should be as small as is consistent with the dignity and welfare of the nation—not smaller than that, for we are neither paupers nor bankrupts, unless we choose to make ourselves so. We can make ourselves both. We have a vast amount of indebtedness to pay, which we can only meet by borrowing. We can so impair our credit, that when we go into the money markets we will be obliged to pay a rate of interest that will be most destructive; but we have not yet been guilty of the folly of destroying our credit. Therefore, let our expenditures be as small as is consistent with our national welfare and dignity.

A second thing we should do is to impose more taxes. The people of this country understand that this is their Government. They know that it is their concern. Their own prosperity and credit are inseparably united with the prosperity and credit of this Government, and our people, whenever the necessity exists, wish to be taxed in proportion to their wealth. They are quite as intelligent as we are, quite as much interested in the welfare of the Government, quite as patriotic; and I am willing to take the consequences of advocating and voting for taxation whenever it is required by the interests of the country. If we should increase our whisky tax from seventy to one hundred cents, it would give us annually an additional sum of eighteen millions of money. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue places it at twenty millions, and assures me that he has the system and the men which will enable him to collect such increased tax. If we should increase the tax on tobacco from twenty cents to thirty-two cents, it would give us annually $12,000,000. These items would give us thirty-six millions. We removed the duty on tea and coffee, but the price of those commodities was not reduced. The amount of that tax was divided, two-thirds going to the benefit of the producer, and one-third to the importer, while the people paid the same price for the articles. I should be very reluctant to impose that tax again upon the people; if it were imposed it would give us annually $18,000,000; and if there should be a necessity for it, I know the people well enough to be assured that they would rather pay the tax than see the credit of their Government impaired. Those three items would give us annually $54,000,000.

Mr. President, those are two measures we should adopt—reasonable retrenchment and necessary taxation.

And the third measure is this: We should do just what we have pledged our faith we would do, "make provision"—that is the language of the pledge—to have the United States notes convertible into coin. This we should do by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time to accumulate gold. I heard what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] said on that subject, and I do not agree with him; I believe it entirely feasible to accumulate gold. It is true Great Britain preferred that the $15,500,000, the amount of the Geneva award, should not be paid here in gold, and preferred keeping it; but if we were taking measures to resume specie payments in this country there is enough of statesmanship in that nation, and enough of appreciation of their own interests, to induce them to afford every facility to aid us to accomplish that purpose. They would interpose no obstacle to our effecting a loan of gold. They know that the difference between gold or convertible notes and irredeemable paper has at some time been an almost prohibitory tariff and an obstruction to their importations here. They know that during the war, when gold was 200, manufactories were established all over the country; that it operated as to many of their manufactures as a prohibition; that to a degree gold, being worth more than our currency, still has that effect. And they would be ready to aid us in obtaining a loan that would enable us to commence specie payments.

But, sir, aside from that, the products of our own mines during the past year were $73,000,000. The amount of gold in our land is admitted to be not less than $150,000,000. Let it be thoroughly understood that we are determined to make provision at the earliest practicable period to have our United States notes convertible into gold, and the consequence would be that those notes would appreciate and approach gold in value. And we could resume with a much less accumulation of gold than has generally been supposed. The increase of tax suggested—$54,000,000 on the articles named—would enable us to put $47,000,000 of gold in the Treasury, and I believe we have about $40,000,000 there now, The Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized to issue bonds, with the proceeds of which he could convert the gold from our mines into specie, and he should have a reserve of bonds, so that if the gold failed he could take up the United States notes with the bonds; and thus everybody would see that slowly but with inexorable certainty we were coming to specie payments, and that, too, without any day being fixed.

Fixing a day would invite many obstacles. As soon as the conviction is created that the notes are to be redeemed, they would be well-nigh equivalent with gold. Then, or even after we have adopted a measure looking to resumption, we will be ready to entertain propositions for free banking.

Mr. President, I hope that, whatever may be done by this Congress, it will not convert our national debt into a basis for a wild-cat circulation and for a demoralizing and destructive speculation.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I have been long hesitating as to whether I should participate in this debate. Believing as I do, however, that the question now before us is the question of the session, I go further, and I have no hesitancy in saying at this day, in the first year of the second Grant Administration, that it will be found to be the grand question of that Administration. I propose to say a few words upon it. And permit me to say here, in my opening remarks, that this matter was beautifully portrayed on Friday last when the battle-cry was raised. It was unnecessary to look at handwritings upon the wall, for it was clearly manifested in the patriotic speeches delivered on that occasion by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] and the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] They had been skirmishing here for weeks, but those gentlemen thought that the hour had arrived when it was proper to make a charge upon the Senate, and a valiant Murat charge we witnessed from those distinguished Senators. Would that I had the power to meet them and drive them back by measuring the lance as ably as they presented it. I know I have not the ability, except that the right is upon my side, and upon it I rely.

Mr. President, it is clear that there is an unmistakable issue here. What is it based upon? The chairman of the Finance Committee, who has distinguished himself for years on the subject of our finances, has presented his plan to the Senate and through the Senate to the country. I have listened here for weeks to the various amendments that have been proposed from time to time, and I have seen and heard no improvement, in my humble opinion, upon the bill as presented by the Committee on Finance; and, as far as I am concerned, for one I propose to stand as nearly by it as I can. Therefore I am evidently opposed to any inflation of the currency.

This is no party measure. That idea is repudiated here from the action already realized. We realize it in every speech that is made. We see republicans leading, going far in the advance, if you please, crying out "More money! More money!" We find the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] on that side of the question. I am always delighted to hear his arguments upon any subject, even if I do not agree with him. He comes down with such power, such vim and physical force, and with such intellect, that I am almost ready to yield; but he is only man, and he too, I think, errs. Then, upon the other side of the Chamber, we hear my friend, the distinguished Senator from the great Old North State, North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] crying out "More money!" The language of my friend [Mr. MORTON] is very remarkable, however, for a great commoner, as the world accords him as being. "Plenty of money" is his demand. Mr. President, that is a latitudinous word. Plenty! I might illustrate his view in this. In the mean time I would ask, who is it that has ever had plenty of money? Girard never had, and I believe he was the first millionaire in the United States. The Astors, following, never had it; your Vanderbilts never had it. Nay, I could invite your attention to the Senate. Is there a millionaire now hearing me or a member of this Senate who has had plenty? Surely not. I have not known one. My friend said "Give us money plenty." That is a very good idea.

But says my other friend from North Carolina, "Increase the volume; we need money in the South and in the West; the country is improving; it is growing vastly." That is all true, Mr. President, and I am delighted to know that it is a fact. I realize it, and I am gratified that it is so. The nation is prospering, and we have prospered to a very great extent in the South in the absence of banks. Notwithstanding the recent panic, what have we realized in the State that I have the honor in part to represent? We claim now to be the leading State in this mighty Union in the growth of cotton. We raised perhaps near five hundred thousand bales of cotton last year, that is now being carried into market; and the city of Galveston, one port in our mighty State, will ship three hundred thousand bales of cotton. We have had no trouble about money there. We have had one or two little national banks there, but we have had ample means to carry the cotton, to send it to New Orleans, to New York, to Liverpool, and to the world.

My friend from North Carolina says, "We want a greater volume of currency; we are suffering for it much in the South; we want it sent down to our States, so as to enable the planters of cotton to sell their cotton for a higher price." Send them down depreciated currency, and thereby appreciate the price of cotton! I mistake very much his constituency if they would indorse that sentiment; but that was his language.

Another distinguished representative from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] whom I love to hear speak—he is eloquent and I love to go through with him in his arguments from time to time, though not agreeing with him upon all points—says the great State of Georgia to-day is suffering very much. That is true, but she has suffered recently more than to-day, however. "But," said he, "at the end of the second year of the war we were possessed of a million head of cattle, and now we are really reduced to seven hundred thousand. Thereby and therefore it is absolutely necessary that you send us greenbacks down there to replace our cattle!" That is a very happy idea. If you will just come over to Texas we have about ten millions yet. We have as many, and more than we have ever had. We are sending them to New Jersey, we are sending them to Rhode Island, to the great State of New York, and elsewhere and they pay us greenbacks. We ask no greenbacks from the State of Rhode Island in Texas, not a dollar, unless we can compete in a commercial point of view and realize on it, and then we surely risk nothing in the commercial transaction. We will send you hides, we will send you our tallow, our cattle, beef, sugar, and we will continue to send that which we have been sending for many years; and I regret it not, I envy it not, I pride in it, you have grown rich by it. I speak of the cotton bales; we will send you them, and we will invite in return your currency. It is satisfactory to the planters in the South; but depreciate it and it will not be; but we are independent on that score, Mr. President.

I might remark here that it has been manifest on the Senate floor that there are scarcely any two minds agreeing on this great subject. What is it? Are we legislating from the tendency of the able arguments presented here in good faith to redeem the nation's pledges? What were they? Very briefly this: And the United States also absolutely pledges its faith to make provision, at the earliest practicable period, for the payment of the United States notes in coin. There are just twenty-seven words there. Could there be any other words of a less number more conclusive, representing what the facts were upon that occasion? My distinguished friend from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] who smiles upon the subject, if he had been getting up a republican platform could not have been more adroit, he could not have drawn it stronger, for nothing could have been invoked that would be better calculated to catch votes than that solemn pledge; and now I wish to have it borne in mind that at no distant day there will be other platforms gotten up, and when they are, this great subject will not be ignored by them. I tell you to-day, when you look to the language of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY]—and likewise, too, I might well call your attention to that of his colleague, [Mr. BAYARD]—you will find that the democracy in due time can build up and present a platform, and they will refer the nation to the arguments and the action of the Senate of the United States; and the little State of Delaware, (a few acres, comparatively speaking, with reference to some other States of the Union,) it may be, will be like a fire-brand thrown into the grand blaze of the mighty West, and they will run over it in the very shortest imaginable period, and they will beat down republicanism and everything that you can invoke, and say to the world, "The republicans have been in power, lo, these many years, and what have they evidenced toward compliance with a redemption of their sacred pledges on the subject of the currency?" Not one word can be said for them. "But," says my distinguished friend near me, [Mr. MORTON,] "keep it in view that some day we must resume specie payments." Well, Moses traveled through the wilderness for about forty years, keeping the land of Canaan in view, and finally he did get it in view, but he never realized it. Does the American nation want to go upon that line any further, to keep it in view, but never get it? That is not the idea. We ought to realize; we ought to go into the land of coin. That is the desire, and I tell you that this nation has got to come up to it or she goes down.

Mr. President, I shall not invoke all the history known to the world as to currency, how long one government or another has been in the absence of specie payments. It is not necessary. It has been done here. My friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] instanced Russia, Prussia, Austria, &c., and the argument here is mainly to show the fact clearly and conclusively that all the governments of Europe have done without specie at times; and then they come down to our own land, where we have been more happy and particularly blessed in developing the resources of this various and vast territory in the absence of specie. I envy not any one of these countries, and I take it for granted that all of them—and I believe such is the history—have at the very earliest day that they could, in the language of this promise, resorted to specie to redeem their pledges.

The distinguished Senator from Indiana who sits farthest from me, [Mr. PRATT,] in his remarks a short time since, I think said something about Spain having an irredeemable currency. What are the facts? I took up a newspaper a day or two since, and there I saw it frankly stated that for the purpose of putting down the rebellion in Spain, which has been raging there for years, they have recently promised their soldiers coin for fighting the battles of the country; and that is what would be required if the battles of this country had to be fought over again. Those ancient pledges would not do again; they would not carry us out in the absence of good faith on the part of the Government, and it certainly would be out of the question to rely upon anything of that kind further.

Do not talk to me about your amendments here for your forty-six or seventy-five millions, going to sea without rudder or compass, and tell me that that would be likely to appreciate the currency of the country. Not a word of it, Mr. President; everybody knows different from that. Gold is what we want; the currency must be based on that; and if we are not able to do it at the instant, let us approximate to it as rapidly as possible; let us show that we are endeavoring to carry out in good faith the pledges of those who have preceded us. Some are here now who solemnly helped to enact this law. I think they will not be recreant to their pledge. They will be very likely to be found in good faith, all anxiety to carry it out.

The next question is this: From all the arguments produced here from the distinguished Senators, with all the invocation of authority upon the subject of finance of the world, not one of them has intimated the manner, in my humble opinion—I wish to do no Senator injustice—not one has told us how we could return to specie payment, as it is termed. Is it impossible? If it is, let us act properly; let us act as practical and sensible men; let us just say that such is the fact, and repeal the law of 1869, repudiate it, and live as we are now living in this happy period, in which the whole nation realizes, as my friends say, the absence of a specie basis entirely, looking only to currency; and then all will understand it alike. Let there be no misunderstanding on this subject, but say we never expect to resume. If we do, how is it possible under the present programme? I liked the remarks the other day of my distinguished friend, the senior Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.] Said he, "Yes; give us more money;" but said he, "Give us better money." That is what I want. I want more money. Who is it that does not? But give us better money. Giving us more does not necessarily show that it will be better. It is directly the contrary; it will be worse. There is not a man that is not aware of that fact.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] told us that he wanted "plenty of money," but then, subsequently, he qualified it, and qualified it very well, but he is still at sea; he said "I mean a reasonable quantity." How are you to ascertain, even by the second scale that he introduces, what is reasonable? When I was a boy and frequented Philadelphia, I heard it stated that there was a poor woman walking along one morning who came to the banking-house of old Stephen Girard. The old gentleman was sitting at the door. Said she, "Mr. Girard, you are very rich, and I am very poor, not able to buy any subsistence now for the family; I think you ought to give me something." Said he, "Certainly, certainly; come in." She stepped in; she was one in humble life and wore an apron with strings around. She went in. He took her to the specie. Said he, "Help yourself; just take as much as you like." The old woman went to work in good faith, filling her apron, and she kept filling it until at length she undertook to get up, and the apron strings broke and away went the money. Said he, "Leave me, good old lady; you would never be satisfied; you can go now." [Laughter.] Just as well might you say that A, B, or C could find plenty, and that it was reasonably plenty; and all would be satisfactory. We cannot arrive at that point.

Now, the whole matter is this: is it not possible that in the Senate of the United States something can be suggested, some proposition submitted, even in a crude form, that something may grow out of, directly enabling the Government of the United States to resume specie payments? If this was an individual matter in which I was interested—and to some extent we have got to look at this great question in that light—what would you do with it? Would you say, "Keep it in view," or "at a convenient season," and all that kind of thing, "this will all work out right?" In his pleasing remarks—for he never makes one that is not pleasing—the distinguished Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] whom I always love to hear speak, I think invoked, by way of illustration, something about a physician looking to a sick patient. I accept the idea; and it does seem to me that the patient is very sick to-day, and here is the distinguished physician close by me, [Mr. MORTON,] for, I believe, in this matter he is the leading one; I think he has immediate charge of the patient. There are surrounding physicians, though, that consult freely. They come to him continually here asking after the symptoms and one thing or another; and they go off very well satisfied, because he speaks learnedly, and thus he passes it off. But there is the patient yet; and what is to be done? The family around the stricken bed have become most seriously concerned about this matter, and they appeal to him a little to one side "O, doctor, tell me, is there any hope?" [Laughter.] Well, my friend cannot resist the appeal; says he, "If the patient gets a little better, and grows no worse, he may recover." [Laughter.] So with the poor greenbacks.

But what are we admonished of in this particular? When the patient was first presented and the physicians brought in, the pulse then, I think, was about the tune of 106 or 108; now it is up to 112 or 113; and it is certainly growing worse every day under their skilled treatment. There is no relief, and it is growing worse daily. Now, then, give it about forty pills of calomel or something or other, (and one amendment here proposes forty-six millions,) and it will die off so easy, after awhile, without any trouble upon earth, that you will never know what hurt it. [Laughter.]

It is a time that we must act. It was stated the other day in one of the arguments here by a Senator that the policy of my distinguished friend, who had so ably conducted the Treasury Department, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] was a do-nothing policy. My friend rose to the issue and spoke correctly on that, because he had been busy, and I had in my humble views to a very great extent indorsed his action. Wherever I could not see very clearly I had abiding faith, and arrived at this conclusion: "He understands the question and is all right; I do not exactly;" and therefore I raised no issue. And thus we went on, and went on prosperously. But then it is said that a great panic has come over the country. When that panic came over the country what were the consequences? An appeal was made to the President of the United States and to the Secretary of the Treasury: "We are sliding downward; we are on the maelstrom of convulsion; reach forth your strong arm and give me a position again." A mighty appeal. That appeal was not unheard, and to some extent it was responded to. There is a difference of opinion among different individuals as to how far it was correctly responded to. Panics will occur; it is the history of the world, and the world is re-enacting history for hundreds and thousands of years, and thus it will continue, provided the greenbacks will last that long, unless you put them on a specie basis.

All these facts are before us. My distinguished friend, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] in his able speech, that the nation received with great applause because they respected his intellect and his experience, his pure motives and intentions being known to them to be right, said it would be very hazardous, enjoying the proud position that we do upon the subject of the currency, and illustrating it by an army in a strong citadel, abundantly fortified to resist any assault from an outside enemy, under any circumstances to make a sally, or to march out from one fort to locate in another. It seemed to me at that moment that I differed with him, and I did not differ with him only, but I differed with great precedents that were before him. If I had been in command when Marshal MacMahon was, when the French Emperor was about to become a prisoner at the feet of the German Emperor, with all his goodness of heart and all his magnanimity, as was abundantly proved afterward to the world, yet there was the Emperor Napoleon III in his care and keeping, I would have made one great sally and tried to have cut my way through and to have declared my Emperor free. I would have done the same if I had been in Marshal Bazaine's place on the day he surrendered; and if he had done so and died in the conflict the world would have said that one of the greatest patriots and generals that had ever been permitted to live had departed in a noble act. He failed to do it, and where is he to-day? He is now ignominiously in exile, where the greenbacks at no distant day will go, unless we come up and make a grand sally to comply with the faith of the Government as solemnly pledged. These are the facts. I would have made one grand struggle, and I would have cut out, and I would have cut into the land of gold, or I would have died in the effort.

Again, I ask the Senate whether it is possible that this gordian knot can be cut? They lost sight, it seems to me, of the resumption of specie payments. They do not desire that, because all the ingenuity, all the authorities, every shadow of intellect are invoked and presented here to show you that the nation is perfectly happy in the absence of coin; and that, therefore, it is idle to talk about a resumption, because you may prostrate the nation, and it would take many years after to relieve us from the misstep. If you make that step and you fail, you will only have been shoveling in the right direction—in the direction that you have solemnly promised to go. As an individual, as a legislator, as an American citizen, I maintain that this whole matter is easily solved, and I invoke the attention of the Finance Committee to the subject in making up their bill finally—for there is none here yet; there are no half dozen Senators here agreeing upon any proposition scarcely; they are halting not only upon two opinions, but upon many. Now frame a bill and just let the basis be a resumption of specie payments in good faith. What are you going to base it upon? Just let the Treasury of the United States, properly organized, advertise under the bill that will be framed that the Government will buy every bale of cotton raised in the South for the next twelve months, and they may thus go on if you like. What will it realize? I would suggest that you pay for this cotton in greenbacks. It will not be as my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] now suggests, bought with depreciated currency, but they will appreciate this proposition, and it will be so accepted and received. I would instance that you say for ordinary cotton 14 cents, good ordinary 16, low middling 18, middling 20, good middling 22; there they are. They are the natural and the leading classes. That is the true classification of cotton. That will bring an average of 18 cents. What will that do? In one point of view it builds up this distressed portion of the country that my friend residing there, as I do, feels so seriously for; not more I hope than I do; and it will give the cotton planter a fine price for his cotton, and in doing so it is not an inflated price, it is just about the average that has been received by the cotton planter since the war. Since the war the sales of the great staple there have averaged 18 cents. We will make this year four million bales of cotton. Put them at $75 a bale, if you like, and there you will have $300,000,000.

My friend from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] in his remarks the other day, said that during the war England exported cotton to the United States. That was correct. Why did she do so? Because she was able to sell it in New York for one dollar and one dollar and a half a pound. Well might she export it and make money by the exportation, and the exporter realize a fine speculation thereby. It occurred to me that I would too if I could get a contract; I would agree to deliver in the city of Washington, on the banks of the Potomac, a million pounds of cotton in twelve months. I would obligate myself to grow it within twenty miles of the city, going into Maryland and into Virginia. I would bring the cotton here for a dollar a pound. I would leave the cotton regions and come here and make it at one dollar. The price regulates it. Cotton has been raised ever since I was a boy in the neighborhood here. When I was a boy they used to pick it around the fireside with a little gin, fronting each other, turning the screws and making the clothes, &c. You can make cotton here, but it will not pay as it will in the South. That is the only difference. But put it at a dollar a pound and many would give up hay and tobacco and go to growing cotton. That is the reason why England exported cotton during the war. "Ah, but," say you, "would you have the United States Government turn cotton factor, speculator?" What is it the United States Government does not do? What is it an honest man should not do that is legitimate and proper to discharge his solemn obligations? When you prepare for battle to repel an invasion, or to meet your foe on whatever field, your officers go out and buy the subsistence of war; you buy all the materials that are necessary and recognized as correct by the proper officers; you buy them for the general welfare of the nation. Is it not for the general welfare, in the language of the Constitution, to provide the means to pay this great national debt? Can you do it? I say unmistakably that you can; I submit it beyond a doubt. We have got the cotton; there has been no year for several years past that the South has not produced $300,000,000 worth. You may talk to me about the cotton being moved. What power moves the cotton? Whence comes the capital to do it? England, France, and other countries buy the cotton. They send their coin here, and their bills of exchange. They know no greenbacks. We do not accept them from them on the payment of their duties; and the Government cannot pride itself very much on that either; and if they object to the one, they ought to wipe out the other as being consistent. Then we have the means, I maintain, to buy the cotton. It is a simple proposition. It may be said that the planter will not take the price suggested. Very good; there is the Government standard, and he who will give more for it let him buy it, all equal and uniform. There is nothing objectionable on that score. No man is compelled to sell, but he looks to his own interest. Is it my interest thus to do?

I may be asked again, where is the money to come from, even the greenbacks to purchase the cotton? My answer will be very simple, without having matured that branch of the subject as it should be done. Commence with $5,000,000; we can at any time in the world raise that; then go into the market, go to New Orleans, to Charleston, go to the large markets with your agents, and commence buying. Where will you sell, where is your customer? England, with her ships at your wharves every moment in the day of every year, seeking cargoes of cotton for the spindles of Europe. There is the coin to buy it. All the "rings" that may be invoked in Wall street, all the speculations that may be spoken of directly or otherwise, are as a shadow when you come to establish the price of cotton in the Liverpool board. That is telegraphed to every southern port three times a day every day of the year. There is the price; nothing else has anything to do with it. When you say to them, "Here is the Government agent to buy the cotton," is there anything more serious in that than there was in sending our distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Richardson, to England to sell our bonds? We went begging, we went to England to sell our bonds, for what? For coin. We need not do that. So they will be compelled to go to the United States to buy the cotton. They will do so, too. They do not care about any other consideration. They will bring you the gold. The very moment you commence to purchase up the five millions, more or less, confidence will be restored throughout the land. The whole South will respond "Well done." They are determined to pay specie to redeem their solemn pledge. That being the fact, we would simply be in the condition of the Frenchman, as the story goes, who had deposited his money with a merchant. He heard a rumor, as rumors are common, that the merchant was in a failing condition. He ran to the merchant with great anxiety and said, "I want my money." "Well," said the merchant, "wait a bit, and I will give it to you," but the Frenchman persisted in clamoring for his money. At length the merchant got rid of the customer he was waiting upon at the time, took the Frenchman into another room, got the key, and commenced opening his safe to pay the money. "What," says the Frenchman, "have you got him?" The merchant replied, "Certainly; if you demand it, here it is for you." "O," said the Frenchman, "if you got him, me no want him!" [Laughter.]

The people would have no use under the sun for the gold if they just knew that their paper money was convertible into gold. I would rather have a national-bank note to-day than the gold, for almost any purpose, if I knew that it would command the gold. But I want to know that fact, and then I shall be satisfied. I walk in the footsteps of that great encyclopedia, Thomas H. Benton, for he was a learned man. He knew the whole history of the country, in every sense of the word, and yet I never indorsed his theory. I was upon the other side of the question with Clay, Webster, and a host of others who were national-bank men. I believe in a national currency, but I want a good one; I want a solid one; I want it to be such a one as was contemplated when Congress provided that at the earliest practicable moment it should be redeemed, and that there should be no increase of the volume until that sacred promise was performed.

Now, if the United States Government will take hold of the cotton it will benefit the South; it will give them a stable price. The prices that I indicate are reasonable. A stimulus will be given to production; cotton will be grown; and I care not if they reduce the production to three million bales, three millions will bring just as much as four millions. We have all manner of experience on this subject. I could have brought the data to establish these facts very easily, but I did not think it necessary to present more than one or two authorities. The authority that I now appeal to is one that will be instantly recognized as meritorious, and I think it is more directly in point than all the books that have been read by my distinguished friends in the course of this debate. But before presenting my main authority, let me give you a voice from Texas, the State that I in part represent, and I read from a letter published in the Galveston News of the 17th instant:

VICTORIA, February 1, 1874.

EDITORS NEWS: There is a good deal of improvement going on in this city. Business is very good just now. The streets have been crowded with wagons, delivering and hauling off goods, during the week. Cotton is coming in freely; they are paying from ten to twelve cents a pound (specie) for it.

Not the depreciated currency that my friend from North Carolina wants. Texas does not want that sort of money. We want the specie, and we have got it there.

They have received and shipped from here, since the 1st of September last, fourteen hundred and fifty-six bales.

Remember, this is a small country town.

The farmers are busy plowing and getting ready to plant. The weather has been delightful the past week. Everybody is planting and setting out fruit trees.

A freedman in the employ of the corporation, while digging on a vacant lot yesterday, dug up forty Spanish dollars. They bore the dates of 1812 to 1819. It caused quite an excitement among the freedmen.

That is the idea. We want to dig the gold there, and we are realizing it; but now, when we plow and hoe our cotton, we realize greenbacks. I do not want to interfere with my friend from Rhode Island, or with any of the Eastern States, and the capital they may have had under the law.

Now I come down to the authority that illustrates more happily and conclusively the action of the Senate than anything I have heard invoked or presented as authority from any portion of the civilized world. It is a document that everybody will recognize as first-rate authority. It is Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper. [Laughter.] I find here a cartoon [exhibiting it to the Senate] illustrating the debate in this body, entitled—

THE GREAT PAPER DELUGE—THE ARTIFICIAL SEA IN THE PLAY OF "MONEY" IN THE NATIONAL THEATER.

SHERMAN (sounding for bottom—gold basis)—I'm sure I almost touch bottom, and if you would only stop those porpoises from agitating this greenback sea, we would certainly get down to hard-pan.

Then comes my friend SCHURZ. I was delighted when he made his speech. I remarked at the time he has approximated pretty nearly the thing. There was no mistake about that. I was delighted to hear him, and so stated. Here you see he comes with his pole, and he says:

I think I touched the solid rock—

He had pretty strong faith, [laughter]—

but these inflationists have roiled the water so much that it is hard to tell.

But now comes the old physician:

MORTON, (to KELLEY.) These fellows think they have touched bottom, but if they had our fish-eyes they would see that their poles are a long way from the hard-pan yet.

You were admonished, Senators, a few moments since by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] that the people had their eyes upon you. You are responsible to them. They have their eyes on you, and telling them "I will keep that in view" will not answer the purpose. You have got to bring out the greasy wallet, untie it, and say, "Here is the money I owe you." Tom Benton stood up here in the Senate with his purse, with the yellow boys shining through the interstices, and the agitation that he raised spread over the country like fire through a prairie. It brought down Nicholas Biddle, the great Clay, Adams, and a mighty host. Then there was a panic in 1836, such a one as I hope never to see again. Talk about your free banking! Then there was free banking. "Give us any banks but a national bank," was then the cry. The land offices paid a great deal of money into these banks. They speculated upon the people. It is recollected by the people yet. I have not time to elaborate and go into that history. I merely call your attention to it. Those facts are not yet forgotten, and to-day we are upon the same line precisely. The Government's money was deposited in banks all over the Union, and then the cry was, "Give us more money; the South and the West want it." They got it. Mississippi, Alabama, and the other Southern States, and the whole country, were flooded with it. I frequently traveled upon the steamboats at that day.

Railroads were not in existence. When I would go up to the office to pay my bill, going to Philadelphia or elsewhere, some Southerner would always lead, and he would step up and pull out a great roll of money, and he would pay, say, twenty dollars. All I had to do then, in a very humble way, as that order of things was not recognized in Texas, as we had not plenty of money, would be to pull out ten dollars, and go along as quietly as possible, and my ten dollars carried me over the same ground precisely, and upon an equality exactly with the twenty dollars of the man from some other Southern State. The States that realized this great blessing of "plenty of money" had to pay two for one. That was their history.

A conversation once occurred between a gentleman and a citizen of Arkansas during that unfortunate period of our history when nearly all the southern banks repudiated and went by the board. This Arkansas gentleman said he understood the subject of currency very well; he was a good financier. Said he, "Just issue more money, and scale it in the first instance down to seventy-five cents; if you have plenty, that is all that is necessary. When that begins to be a little hard, just issue more, and put it down to fifty cents; and then after you scale it two or three times, just repudiate the whole." [Laughter.] Sir, that is the way you will end here, if you go on in this way. If you yield to this cry, "Give us more money; give us plenty of money," where is the stopping point? You will never reach it; and finally the proposition will come here to repudiate the whole, and there will be the end of it.

I know something about financiering in a small way. Texas has been a State of this proud Union for about thirty years, and I recollect I was one of the members of her first Legislature. We owed about $12,000,000 of debt that had been honestly contracted for the redemption and the liberty of Texas, that mighty territory, from Santa Anna and his minions; and, by the way, I see that Santa is on his way back home to Mexico again. [Laughter.] Well, sir, upon that occasion, when I was a candidate for the Legislature, I had not a great deal of experience. One of my competitors, however, was a very wise man, a wordy man, and, said he, "Fellow-citizens, elect me to the Legislature, and I will go there and financier." He did not know the meaning of the word for all that. Everybody expected to hear something then. Thinks I to myself, "Good God! he has got me now." Said he, "I will take one and make two;" and there he left the subject. [Laughter.] That is what we are doing now. We are getting directly to that point. We are going to take one and make two. Senators do not exactly tell us the process, except "Give us plenty of money; that is all we want; do not talk about gold; it will ruin the country; the country must be saved; it is our bounden duty to do this; the people expect it of us." Can you take one and make two? If you can, and the two, as my friend from Michigan expressed it, will be better than what we have now, then I indorse it.

I want more money, but if it is not to be better than that which we have, I have no use for it under the sun. We have plenty of it. I am fond of it. The citizens of my State take it pretty freely now, although for a considerable period they did not. They had been most awfully burned with paper money in the early days of the confederacy. When that money first came out, patriotism was so rampant that you could not find a Jew in the whole country who would not give a hundred dollars in gold for a hundred-dollar confederate bill. You could not have got that fellow into the army in God Almighty's world in any way, [laughter;] but he wanted to show his patriotism, and he would say, "I love this money; it is good; give me that hundred-dollar bill and here is the gold for it." The moment the conscript law was passed, that fellow was across the Rio Grande into Mexico. [Laughter.] I remember that about that time a man was coming along with a led horse, and I asked him what he would take for it, and he said $100. I pulled out $100 in confederate money, and he said certainly he would take it. In about two years I could have got about $2,000 for that horse, and yet when he was valued at $2,000 I could not have put him in the market and realized ten dollars in gold for him.

It will not do for my friend from North Carolina to talk about sending down this currency to the South to buy the cotton with, and getting an enlarged price for it. The people of the South want money. They have had too much of this inflation. During the happy day of the rebellion, as a great many of them considered it, they would admit that they had plenty, and a little too plenty. Then the people were told, "If you will just deposit up this money we will give you good money, two-thirds of its face value. We will give seventy-five cents to the dollar, two thousand for three thousand." What a grand speculation! That was to be good money, however.

Sir, promises of that sort will not answer. We must be up and doing if we intend to redeem the pledge of the nation. If we would make the people happy let them know that we have endeavored to appreciate rather than depreciate the currency of the country.

I hope that the attention of the Finance Committee will be directed to the cotton bales. If my friends MORTON, SCHURZ, and the chairman of the Finance Committee—the last first—had only had cotton bales attached to their poles when sounding for bottom in the picture that I exhibited to the Senate, the gold would have spouted up and there would have been no trouble about the foundation at all. We have got it; it is ours.

We export millions of dollars' worth of tobacco to England every year; and since I was a boy—I do not recollect now when the bill passed, but for more than half a century—you shipped your hogsheads, boxes, or packages of tobacco, be they what they may, to Liverpool. When it goes into the Queen's warehouse the intrinsic value may be only three-pence, six-pence, eight-pence, or ten-pence, and yet when the manufacturer or consumer withdraws it from the Queen's warehouse it has to pay a revenue of seventy-five cents in gold, thereby realizing millions of dollars annually out of our tobacco crop.

What does the French government do? The French government makes a monopoly of it. They send their agents here; they are in the tobacco markets of the United States, and they make their selection. They buy a fine light tobacco, unlike England and Germany; they buy different grades. The French government buy the fine light tobacco. They sell it to their subjects, thereby realizing an immense revenue by popularizing it; but it is a speculation to support the government. Then may we not buy our cotton, or become the agents for all those who will recognize us as such, and sell the cotton of the Union to the world? They will come in and they will pay you gold for it; and that gold will give confidence, and in the absence of confidence it will replenish your coffers to that extent that you will thereby be enabled to pay gold beyond any doubt.

Mr. President, if I had time I would say more; but I will not detain the Senate longer.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, the Finance Committee, when they reported this bill, appear to have had a single object in view, and that was to provide some way by which the act of 1870, requiring a redistribution of a portion of the national-bank currency, could be carried out. The members of the Senate are not quite satisfied, as is perfectly evident, with that idea, and the effort has been to ingraft a good many other propositions upon this bill; so many, that it appears to me that this discussion will be of some benefit to the Finance Committee, and if this bill should be referred back to them they would be enabled to present another bill that would be more in harmony with the views of the majority of the Senate. With that view I move that the bill be referred back to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SPENCER in the chair.) The Senator from Connecticut moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I am satisfied that there are a number of Senators here who wish to speak on this bill, but are not prepared to do so now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the remark of the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. For my part I see no advantage to be attained by referring this bill back to the committee. Already nearly three months of this session have been lost, so far as financial questions are concerned. The committee first brought forward a resolution which was of a doctrinal or sentimental character, which in itself involved no measure, and the Senate was amused and entertained with that for about two months. Then they brought about this twenty-five million bill, confessedly a half-way, not even a third of a way measure. It was originally, in 1870, only a crust, and is now brought forward simply as a little soothing-sirup, for the purpose of tiding this thing over. I do not see what we have to gain by now referring this bill back to the committee. We understand what the sentiments of that committee are. I believe they have all expressed themselves. We understand what the views of the chairman are; they have been repeatedly declared upon this floor. This question will ultimately have to be settled in the Senate. It is now before the Senate. I think it better to keep it here until we come to a vote. If my friend from Connecticut, who I know has true expediency always in view as well as what is right, can show what is to be gained by referring it back, I shall cheerfully yield to him, for one.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not know that I am correct in my judgment, but my impression is that this discussion has brought out so clearly the views of different Senators as to show that we cannot harmonize on this bill; and my object in moving that it be recommitted to the committee is in the hope that they may present a bill, after this discussion, which will more completely harmonize the views and which will command without any real difficulty a vote of the majority of this body. I will say still further that I think from this discussion they will endeavor to present a bill that will meet the views, as far as possible, of those members of the Senate who feel aggrieved that they have not a full proportion, or what they call a proportion, of the currency; and I think, also, they would present a bill which would come nearer than anything which has yet been presented to meeting the views of those who think there is no other salvation for our financial difficulties than by inflation. I do not know how far they would go in that direction, but it seems to me that they would not present a bill unless they thought it was one that would command the vote of the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have no doubt that all Senators are becoming exceedingly anxious to have something practical before us on this subject of finance. It was my intention at one time to have spoken on the general subject, after the resolution was reported from the Finance Committee; but the drift of the discussion upon that resolution soon satisfied me that it would be better if we could direct our discussion to practical measures when they were presented.

Now, first, what did that resolution propose for the consideration of the Senate? It proposed, in the first place, the question of how and when the United States currency was to be redeemed, and that question was deemed almost synonymous with the question of how and when specie payments were to be resumed, although I think they are in some respects different. The second question which it presented was what quantity and what character of currency shall be provided for the wants of business. The discussion went on upon those questions for several weeks. Then the Finance Committee reported the bill which is now under consideration, a bill simply to carry into effect the sixth section of the act of 1870 for the distribution of $25,000,000 of national-bank currency. After a discussion of a week on that bill, we now have before us a proposition to increase the currency by $46,000,000, and notice of another proposition for free banking. It is thus evident that whether we discuss these questions upon the resolution that the Senate committee reported, or upon any measure which proposes to treat upon any one branch of the financial question, the whole subject is to be thrown open; and I think it is evident that the Finance Committee might as well get down to the work of meeting all the questions that are to be met in solving the financial problems now presented to the country.

Mr. HOWE. They are all here.

Mr. SCOTT. They are all here, as the Senator from Wisconsin suggests; but the mode in which the Finance Committee proposes to deal with each of them may as well be presented in one bill. Then each Senator can propose his amendments as concerning the particular subject affected by the different sections of that bill. If my colleague thinks free banking is the antidote for all the ills that are complained of, then he can propose that. If we are to have the national-bank notes instead of a mixed currency of national-bank notes and legal-tender notes, an amendment can be offered meeting that; but we shall have this advantage, that the Senate will have at least the opinion of the Finance Committee upon the system which is to be proposed for our finances hereafter. Treating it in this way, we do not really get a view of the system which is proposed.

Suppose you do incorporate on this bill the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, increasing the national-bank circulation $46,000,000, you have to touch one subject in connection with the currency; you have not touched the main question which was brought forward in the resolution of how and when the United States currency is to be redeemed, whether it is to be redeemed absolutely in coin at once, or whether we are to present the alternative of redeeming it in coin or in interest-bearing bonds of the Government. So that we should really have made but very little progress in disposing of the whole question if we are to act upon the bill now before the Senate; or if we did, it would be by adopting suggestions and amendments which would not have the advantage of having been considered in committee.

Upon the whole, I am inclined to think that we shall save time by committing all these questions, the resolution and this bill together, to the Committee on Finance, so that they may bring before the Senate a bill embodying such views as the majority of them may be able to agree upon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no personal desire about whether this subject is recommitted to the Committee on Finance again or not. Indeed, I hardly know exactly how to vote. On the whole, I think I shall vote for the motion to recommit; and I shall be guided by this consideration. The Committee on Finance reported a bill that they believed would receive the general assent of the Senate, a bill to carry into execution an existing law; it affects only a few States by withdrawing from their circulation a portion of that which they have in excess. We ascertained very clearly that the representatives of these States would much prefer the adoption of that expedient to many others that have been proposed; but it was only, as the Senator from Indiana has so often said, a half-way measure; that is, it was a measure to carry into effect the existing law; it did not propose to make any new legislation except in aid of the provisions of the existing law.

When this measure is brought here, although I believe four-fifths of the Senate are in favor of it, although I believe when it comes to a vote there will not be five Senators against the original proposition of the Committee on Finance, although it receives the general assent of every one, yet it is antagonized with all kinds of propositions on a great variety of subjects. The question of equalizing the bank circulation is a very minor one to the questions introduced in this debate. I feel embarrassed now. Suppose the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is adopted; then the Senate will have decided in favor of increasing paper money. Then, as a matter of course, those who believe in redeeming paper money as well as issuing it would have to propose some mode of redeeming or retiring it. And so, when the proposition of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is brought up, I am in favor of free banking, but I am in favor of free banking in connection with something else; and, therefore, before a vote on his proposition could be reached various propositions would be made to redeem the paper money he proposes to issue, and I have no doubt some of those plans of redemption would meet his judgment. The subject must all go together. If, therefore, the Senate is not satisfied with passing a bill to cure an evil that everybody admits ought to be cured, but is determined to discuss every variety of question and every variety of measure upon any proposition which affects the general subject, it seems to me it is better for the Committee on Finance at once to take the responsibility, and present whatever plan they can present, and let the Senate as a matter of course act upon it according to their judgment. I therefore, on the whole, shall vote for the recommittal rather than continue this discussion for a long time, when the result will probably be unsatisfactory and incomplete.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I feel as though this would be a very strange proceeding at this time. After a discussion involving several weeks of time in reference to various propositions that are presented to the Senate without a vote on a single one of them, without getting the sense of the Senate on any proposition whatever in reference to the currency, a motion is now made to refer the whole matter back to the Finance Committee. Had this motion not been made by my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] who is always actuated by motives that tend to fairness in legislation, I should think that there had been some arrangement about this for the purpose of obviating a vote, for the purpose of depriving the Senate of an opportunity of expressing their opinions in reference to the particular questions that have been before the Senate.

Now, let us look at the history of this matter for one moment. The Finance Committee came into the Senate with various resolutions. First, the chairman of the committee presented a resolution on which he asked the sense of the Senate by way of instruction to that committee, as to whether they should provide ways and means for the redemption of our paper. A minority resolution was offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] declaring in favor of a moderate increase of the currency. Another report was offered by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] squarely in favor of returning to specie payments at once. These three propositions were brought in from the Finance Committee and presented to the Senate for the sense of the Senate. They were discussed for many days. Then the Finance Committe introduced this bill for a distribution of twenty-five millions excess of currency in some of the Eastern and Middle States to the other States that have not received their proper proportion under the law. This it is said by the committee is merely carrying into effect an existing law. Hence they want the sense of the Senate, or, in other words, they desire this bill passed. The Finance Committee have now discovered that they cannot pass this bill. If they can, why do they wish it re-referred?

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will allow me to say that I do not think even the Senator from Illinois would vote against the bill; but I find that we cannot pass this bill without having propositions coming from single Senators, totally disconnected with the bill, upon other points, debated and discussed and voted upon before any vote can be reached upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. The Senator believes that I would not vote against this bill. It is not necessary now for me to express my opinion as to whether I will or will not; but if not more than five will vote against the bill, as I understood the Senator from Ohio to state a moment ago, why re-refer it? Why not vote down these amendments and pass your bill, if you have the ability and power to do it? Why do you seek to re-refer it? Do you re-refer this bill for the purpose of re-presenting the opinions of the Finance Committee whether they agree with a majority of the Senate or not? It is a strange proceeding. Is this Senate compelled to take the opinions of a committee if they do not agree with them? It seems to me not, It is just as easy now, and more easy, to have the expression of the Senate on these propositions as it is to re-refer them and then reproduce them again for the assent or dissent of the Senate.

What is to be gained? It is very plausibly argued by members of the Finance Committee that, inasmuch as there are various propositions suggested here, the question had better be re-referred. If we re-refer it, what is to be reproduced by the Finance Committee? The majority of the Finance Committee have expressed their views by the proposition they have offered. We desire to test the question before the Senate whether the views of the Finance Committee are to be carried out by the Senate or are disagreed to. My opinion is, that the Senate will not agree to the proposition of the Finance Committee. I may be mistaken about that; but if I am, it is very easy to test it.

Now there is but one legitimate, proper, and fair mode of legislating in this country. We are all upon an equality in this Chamber. Each of us represents his constituents, and tries to do it to the best of his ability. Our constituents expect us to legislate fai ly and honestly. How can we do that except by a fair and honest expression of our opinions here in this Chamber? If at the time we are about to take a vote upon the proposition to decide the question as to whether we will have an increase of the currency or a contraction of the currency—one or the other of these propositions or some third proposition—how will you arrive at the fact, how do you arrive at the opinions of members of the Senate except by a vote? I know no other mode. I do not consent to the proposition that all legislation in this Chamber must be that legislation which conforms to the opinions of any committee. Legislation, to be honest, fair, and proper, should conform to the opinions of the majority of the Congress of the United States, and not to the opinions of a committee unless that committee is in accord with the representatives of the people.

If the majority of this Chamber are in favor of free banking; that is to say, if they are in favor of extending the present banking law to all associations in this country, so as to prohibit in future that monopoly which has grown up by having exhausted the power under the law in the circulation that they are authorized to have—if that is odious, and a majority of this Chamber are in favor of striking off these restrictions and opening it to all the associations in different States and counties of this country, I ask the Senate to tell me by what other mode you will arrive at that than the one that is proposed here to-day? Does it require a committee to prepare a long bill to provide for extending the banking privileges that now are exercised under the laws of this country to others than those who exercise them? I presume not. Four lines will do it. Merely provide that the restrictions are repealed so far as circulation is concerned, and you have the whole thing. It does seem strange to me that a committee must examine this question and revise the proposition when you have one before you, as fair a one as you can draft in a month's time. If that is the view of the Senate, let us vote upon it; and if the Senate vote down the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] which is merely to extend the banking privileges and banking facilities to other people of this country besides those that now have them under the law, be it so. I myself am in favor of his proposition, and I am just as well prepared to vote for it now as I shall be when it goes through your hands, sir; and I want to vote for it because it is a fair and honest proposition. It gives to the people of this country equality of rights under the laws in reference to banking; it restricts the privileges of no man; it gives the trade of this country a right to move in its own channels; it gives it the power to control, either in large amounts or small amounts, the currency of the country; it leaves that to be either expanded or contracted by the wants and necessities of commerce and trade among the people; it leaves it in that condition that the people of this country require things shall be left, because the judgment of the Republic—and when I say "the Republic" I mean the majority of the people in this country irrespective of political associations or political parties—is against the moneyed power of this country being restricted to a few capitalists; and the time will come, if not now so expressed by the voice of this Senate, that that voice will be heard in thunder tones throughout the land reverberating all over it; for that is the sentiment of this country; it is the sentiment of all free people. It is right and it is just, and it belongs to each and every man to exercise the same right under the law that belongs to any other man.

This is a mere dodge—I call it by its right name—it is a mere dodge to get this thing back in the hands of the committee, and there it may not see the light of day again. I do not mean that they will refuse to report a proposition, but they will not report this proposition; and why? Because the majority of that committee are against it as evinced by the declarations on this floor. This proposition suits me, and I hope it suits a majority of the Senators in this Chamber. If we fail in extending the privileges that are exercised by a few to the many, then let us take the vote on the next proposition. If we, who believe in extending the privileges under the law to the many that are now exercised by the few, are in a minority here to-day, it is very easy to test that question, and if we are, we will as cheerfully yield as men ever did, here or elsewhere. We will not ask that you recommit it to us; we will not try any pranks of legislation, but we will yield to the voice of the Senate, and let that decide the question.

Then, next, if the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] is acceded to, that is a plain proposition. What is it? That $46,000,000 of currency in excess of what is already in circulation shall be issued. How issued? Issued to banks that are now organized, or may be organized in States having less than the amount of currency to which they are entitled under the law. The authority there is given to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the amount of currency to the banks that may apply for it up to the limit of $46,000,000. There is a plain and simple proposition that all can understand.

If that is voted down, what next? Then the proposition is, shall we distribute $25,000,000 of currency to those States having less than the amount they are entitled to; or if that is not sufficient, then the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] proposing to substitute $50,000,000 in lieu of the $25,000,000. These propositions are all simple; and these questions belong legitimately to this bill, and cannot be avoided if it is recommitted and re-reported. Why, sir, does this Finance Committee suppose that when this bill goes back to them, and they re-report it, we are abridged in our right to move amendments? Do they presume that we are restricted from moving the same propositions here on this floor that we have now moved? I give you notice that you may refer as often as you choose, but you never will get rid of a vote on these propositions in this Senate Chamber until they are decided. You may mark that down in your books. You cannot avoid it; we intend to have the vote, and you may recommit as long and as often as you please, but you cannot dodge the issue that you have brought here, and that is presented now to the Senate. No such maneuvering as this will avoid the issue on this proposition. It cannot be done in that way. You might just as well face the music one time as another, because you have got to face it some time, and we might just as well have it out now as at any other time.

Your reference to the committee again will do what? It will reproduce the same arguments over and over again that we have had here for months past, and more too. It will bring about the sane discussion; and you cannot avoid it when you bring in your new proposition. Each and every man will desire to express his opinions, and those opinions will be expressed anyhow by those who have already expressed their views. Hence you avoid nothing. You do not avoid the controversy. You do not avoid the discussion; and I pledge you my word you do not avoid the vote.

I have learned in my short life that nerve is a very good thing, properly exercised. Boldness is not always best, but generosity is always good; and I hope this committee and its friends will not be so lacking in generosity toward their fellow-Senators on this floor that they will try to avoid having a vote on these propositions. It is better that they be settled now. It is better that that committee to-day should have the nerve to stand by their proposition here and let us vote on it than it is to make a retreat through and under the cover of an ambush in order to get a new proposition before the Senate. Why, sir, it is an inglorious retreat. It is a retreat with your drums muffled, no sound heard to tell the course you are taking. If I am defeated in a contest, I will acknowledge it. If I am beaten, I will go down with my colors flying; and I will make the drums sound the louder, to let the enemy know that I am still alive. But this is a piece of strategy not new in legislation—often resorted to by men who are stricken with a fit of alarm in reference to the success of their proposition or their measure. The idea that the Finance Committee should ever get alarmed, when it has controlled the Senate!

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend from Illinois will not speak of this motion coming from the Finance Committee. They have offered no such proposition.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not allude to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not make this motion, nor did any member of the Finance Committee. It was offered by a gentleman not a member of the Finance Committee. Indeed I hesitated about how I should vote. I have had no consultation about it. If the Senator thinks we are going to evade any contest on the subject he is very much mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. No; I did not say a contest, but a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to take the vote to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. We have had the contest; we have discussed it for weeks; and now we want the vote. If I am wrong in saying the Finance Committee did not care anything about this, I beg their pardon for having said so; but strange discoveries are constantly made, and I notice that each one of the Finance Committee who has spoken in reference to it has concluded it will be best to refer this bill. How they could have been convinced so readily by the argument of my friend from Connecticut I do not know; but yet they seem to acquiesce very meekly and mildly, and think it is a very nice thing to have the bill go back, because they are so much more able to prepare a bill than the rest of us, and when they bring it back we can vote intelligently! I say nothing of this kind with a view of reflecting on that committee; for I have the highest respect for them as gentlemen and Senators, and for their ability. But with all their ability, I say to them that they differ with the views of some of us; and while they differ with us, they have no right to smother this thing and prevent a vote. That is what I say, and that is what I mean.

A fair, simple issue is placed before the Senate to be decided; and a vote to recommit the bill to the committee is a vote against the various propositions that have been before the Senate; nothing more, nothing less. When will this committee report? They asked for instructions. They came to the Senate and asked us to instruct them how they should report. Now they very maturely say, "Let it all be referred to us again without a vote as to how we shall be instructed." You ought not to have asked us to instruct you; you ought not to have requested it from the Senate, if it is not that we are to have a vote now. To recommit this bill means to hold it until a plan can be matured by minds differing from one another, which will be late in the session, perhaps, and then to occupy the balance of the session in discussing the question, with the result that no proposition will be passed at all. That would suit my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] because he is rather between the two; he does not want anything; he wants to "let well enough alone." That is his idea, precisely. I think there are a good many others who feel that they would rather have nothing done, and that this is a good way to do nothing. That is the idea I get from this proposed reference.

If there are friends to any of these propositions, I hope they will stand by them and let us have them settled and decided now; and when I say "now," I do not mean this moment; but I mean let the discussion go on until everybody has said what he desires to say, and then let us vote on the different propositions. If the Committee on Finance desire—and I make this suggestion to them—these propositions as merely instructions to them, they have a right to move amendments here; let them move amendments; let them attempt to change them as they desire in the instructions as to what kind of a bill they shall report; and then we shall get the sense of the committee; and in these various ways we shall get the sense of the Senate on these different propositions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, this is a proposition to recommit; and to recommit, I suppose, means to recommit the original bill to the committee, and all that is pending. I have listened to my honorable friend from Illinois with interest, of course, but with no little surprise. What is this bill that comes from the committee? It is to execute a law found to be defective, which was passed in 1870 for the purpose of meeting the views of certain gentlemen in certain sections of this country, which have been largely reproduced since this question has been reopened. The Committee on Finance, who are the financial organ of this body, say that they had no reason to apprehend that anybody anywhere, who at any other time desired this proposition, would be in a condition to oppose it now; and precisely upon what principle it is that those who in 1870 insisted upon this proposition should refuse to accept it now is what it is a little bit difficult for me to understand, either in logic or upon any other ground.

Why, Mr. President, here is a simple proposition from the Committee on Finance, involving nothing in the world but a redistribution of the sum of $25,000,000 which is claimed, nay, is demanded by certain States who have not their proportion of the currency; it was demanded in 1870, and that demand has been iterated and reiterated here—I will not say constantly from that time down, but repeatedly, and to-day by my honorable friend from Indiana over the way, [Mr. PRATT,] in language impugning somewhat the communities in the East who are supposed to have an excess of this circulation.

And now my honorable friend from Illinois arraigns the Committee on Finance as cherishing a purpose in some adroit way to circumvent the well-ascertained judgment and sense of this Senate, as he assumes, on the whole question of finance. Well, Mr. President, I have been a very attentive, a quite candid, and a rather disinterested listener to what has taken place on the subject of finance since this bill came in——

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator mean to say that I asserted what was the well-ascertained judgment of the Senate?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I do not assert it; but the language of my honorable friend, and the air of triumph, and the spirit in which he applied himself to what he called the strategy and strategic movements of the committee to circumvent, leave you inevitably with the inference that there is a well-ascertained judgment and sentiment here which, by some adroit movement of legislation, is about to be circumvented. That is what I mean to say he gave us to understand.

Now, for myself, having carefully considered this whole question so far as it has been presented, no thorough conviction has been produced on my mind at all in any direction; and I should like to see the man that has been able to gather out of all that has been said here anything like a settled judgment upon any one proposition of finance. The sentiments and opinions that have been introduced here and discussed have been as diverse as the propositions, and they are many. Out of all this is there any enlightened judgment of the Senate to-day on the question of finance? And are we to be told that on a single proposition involving no question of finance at all, nothing but providing for the execution of a proposition originating four years ago, it is either legitimate or fit or proper to discuss the whole question of finance, and that upon a moment we who are not skilled in these matters are to make up our judgments without the aid of the organ of the Senate upon this question; that we are to make up our judgment and are to make it up at once on these propositions as they come upon us thick and fast, day after day—propositions so extraordinary in their character as that I think almost any man who has the good of his country at stake would hesitate to vote upon them without a great deal of deliberation and opportunity for consideration? Let us see.

My honorable friend says he is ready, willing, anxious, to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] and that this effort of the committee, to whom he attributes the effort to get the subject back to the committee, is to smother that proposition. Does my honorable friend know that that is not before the Senate at all, and has not been? And are we ready to discuss and consider such a proposition as that, and to vote upon it this afternoon, or to vote upon it at any other time, without the consideration of the Committee on Finance? Is the Senator from Illinois sure that he comprehends the length and the breadth, the depth and the height, of free banking without limitation and restriction in a country with between seven and eight hundred millions of irredeemable currency? If he is, he is a bolder man than most men who deal with such subjects. I can understand that in a contingency, in a certain condition of affairs, free banking might not be an absolute peril, but free banking under these circumstances is utter ruin, in my judgment.

Mr. President, to a simple proposition, involving none of these questions at all, these other questions have been attached, and now that a disposition has been manifested to tack upon it these collateral questions, questions not in any way involved in it, so that to-day, upon this simple proposition, you have the whole range of finance, upon which the Committee on Finance have not passed at all, it seems to me most eminently fit, most eminently proper, that we should not only have the advantage of the deliberations of this committee, whether they are willing or not, but that we have a right to have them, and we who do not devote ourselves to this particular subject ought to demand it, and let us have the whole subject considered, and the benefit of their judgment upon the whole subject. I shall therefore vote for recommitment, with the expectation that the committee, at an early day, will present the subject to the Senate, after having regard to all the propositions which have been submitted or which have been proposed to be submitted in any contingency.

Now, just one word more, and I am done. I want to bring the Senate back for a moment to the attitude of affairs on the question of this expansion or more currency. I venture no opinion at all upon that subject; I am not going to discuss it in any way whatever; but I remember in 1870, when the proposition, a part of which this bill is to execute, was before the Senate, it was said that there were communities and States that had not their fair proportion of the banking currency of this country. That was true. It was true then; it is true now, undoubtedly, that is, in the sense in which it was spoken; and it was demanded that there should be redistribution of the currency, and also that there should be an enlargement of the circulation. My recollection of it is, that fifty-four millions of bank currency were added with a redistribution of twenty-five millions. The $54,000,000 have been divided to the States who had not their proportion of the circulation. That has been executed. It remains only to execute the $25,000,000 provision; making an increase of $54,000,000, and the redistribution of $25,000,000, making $79,000,000 distributed to the States who were supposed not to have had their fair proportion of the circulation.

What was the character of the proposition? Was it supposed by anybody here then or now that in the year 1874 these communities would come here again and demand more in the way of equalizing the currency among the States? Was there any intimation to that effect? Had anybody any reason to suppose that in 1874 we should be discussing that question again? I do not think so. I do not suppose anybody believed it. Now, sir, the demand is just as exigent as it was then; "more money," in other words more currency, more irredeemable paper; not one step toward specie payments, none contemplated, none expected, apparently none desired; but more irredeemable paper. What is the effect of that? The indefinite postponement, of course, of any demand, or desire, or expectation of a return to specie payments. That is the effect of it, as everybody knows. It illustrates this great fact, which nobody need keep out of mind: the more you have of this irredeemable money the more you will need. Issue $50,000,000 to-day, and you will need $100,000,000 two years hence. There is no end to the demand which follows the issue of irredeemable paper; and the fact that we stand here to-day hesitating to execute the legislation of 1870, unless there can be added to it $50,000,000 of currency, is conclusive evidence in my mind of the pernicious tendency of this sort of legislation.

I shall vote, Mr. President, to recommit this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, the pending proposition, I understand——

Mr. CAMERON. The discussion of this question is becoming so interesting that I think the country will gain profit by letting it continue a day or two longer. Therefore I move that we now go into executive session.

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania for that purpose.

Mr. STANARD also presented the following concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, in reference to the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific Railroads; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

Concurrent resolution in reference to the Kansas Pacific and Union Pacific Railroad Companies.

Whereas, by act approved July 1, 1862, commonly known as the "Pacific Railroad act," the Congress of the United States provided for a main line of railroad and telegraph to be built by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, incorporated by said act, from a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, to the west line of Nevada Territory, and to connect through the Pacific Ocean; and said act of Congress also provided for several branches to extend eastwardly from the initial point of said railroad, one to Kansas City, one to Saint Joseph, and one to Sioux City, on the Missouri River, and said Union Pacific Railroad and its branches having received subsidies in lands and bonds from the United States, and the companies having accepted the several acts of Congress incorporating and providing for said road and branches, are subject to the same in all their provisions; and whereas, by the twelfth section of said act of Congress of July 1, 1862, it is provided that "the whole line of said railroad and branches and telegraph shall be operated and used for all purposes of communication, travel, and transportation, so far as the public and the Government are concerned, as one connected, continuous line;" and by the fifteenth section of the amendatory act of July 2, 1864, it is provided that "the several companies hereby authorized to construct the aforesaid roads, are hereby required to operate and use said roads and telegraph for all purposes of communication, travel, and transportation, so far as the public and the Government are concerned, as one continuous line, and in such operation and use to afford and secure to each equal advantages and facilities as to rates, time, and transportation, without any discrimination of any kind in favor of the road or business of any or either of said companies, or adverse to the road or business of any or either of the others;" and whereas, by the ninth section of the said act of July 2, 1864, it is provided that "any company authorized by this act to construct its road and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the initial point aforesaid, (one hundredth meridian,) may construct its road and telegraph line so as to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad at any point westwardly of such initial point in case such company shall deem such westward connection more practicable or desirable;" and by the act amendatory of said acts, approved July 3, 1866, the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, one of said branches, (then known as the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division,) was required to connect its road with the Union Pacific Railroad at a point not more than fifty miles west of the meridian of Denver; and by the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1869, the said Kansas Pacific Railway Company was required to connect its road with the Union Pacific Railroad at Cheyenne, in Wyoming Territory, as a branch of the said Union Pacific Railroad, and was authorized to contract with the Denver Pacific Railway Company to construct and put in operation that part of its line between Denver and Cheyenne; and Congress took care to provide in said act that "all provisions of law for the operation of the Union Pacific Railroad, its branches and connections, as a continuous line without discrimination, shall apply the same as if the road from Denver to Cheyenne had been constructed by the said Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division," (now Kansas Pacific Railway Company,) which connection at Cheyenne having been accomplished in the year 1870, the whole line has been and is now operated by the Kansas Pacific Railway Company as a continuous branch of the Union Pacific Railroad from Cheyenne, in Wyoming, to Kansas City, in Missouri, pursuant to the acts of Congress aforesaid; and whereas the said Kansas Pacific Railway Company having thus constructed and put in operation about seven hundred and forty-five miles of first-class railroad, extending from Kansas City, in Missouri, to a connection with the Union Pacific Railroad, at Cheyenne, in Wyoming, as provided for and required in the acts of Congress, the people of the several States and Territories are entitled, by law, to uniform rates of freight and passage, eastward and westward, over the Union Pacific Railroad and over the Kansas Pacific Railroad, as a branch thereof, without discrimination of any kind in favor of the road or business of either of said companies, or adverse to the road or business of either of them. And any discrimination by the Union Pacific Railroad Company against freight and passenger traffic from the Kansas Pacific Railway, destined to points on the Union Pacific Railroad, west of Cheyenne, or to points beyond the western terminus of said last-named road, as also any discrimination by said Union Pacific Railroad Company against eastward-bound freight and passenger traffic from points west of Cheyenne, and destined to points on the Kansas Pacific Railway, or east of its eastern terminus, is in violation of the laws of the United States, and injurious to the people, who are, by law, entitled to uniform rates of freight and passage over said Union Pacific Railroad and branches; and every such discrimination by the Kansas Pacific Railway Company against freight and passenger traffic to or from the Union Pacific Railroad, is alike in violation of law and injurious to the people; and whereas the people of Missouri are largely interested in commerce and intercourse with the vast and rapidly developing regions traversed by the Union Pacific Railroad and branches, and, together with the people of adjacent States, are entitled to all the benefits of the uniform rates and choice of routes which were intended and provided for in the acts of Congress organizing and subsidizing said railroads: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate, (the house of representatives concurring therein,) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge upon the consideration of their respective Houses such legislation as will secure to the people of the United States those equal advantages and facilities as to rates, time, and transportation on the Union Pacific Railroad, and the several branches thereof, which are reserved and guaranteed to them as a chief part of the consideration to be given by the companies for the grant of lands and bonds so generously given to them by Congress.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress for this State.

Approved February 4, 1874.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, respectfully represent that, whereas a large majority of the people of this Territory are accused of disloyalty, insubordination, and other violations of the Constitution and laws of the United States; and whereas these accusations are absolutely untrue, and are made with malicious intent to procure proscriptive legislation by Congress:

Therefore, being anxious that legislation, if upon thorough investigation any should be deemed necessary, should be such as will conduce to the greatest good of all, we respectfully and earnestly solicit your honorable body to send to Utah a commission of investigation, with instructions to inquire into the alleged abuses in our territorial affairs, and with authority to send for persons and papers needed in the prosecution of their inquiry. And we further respectfully ask your honorable body for the protection of what we deem the best interests of the whole people of the Territory, to suspend all action, so far as special legislation for Utah is concerned, until such time as said commission shall have had opportunity to investigate and report. And for a course so conducive to wise, and consequently beneficial, legislative action, we your memorialists will ever pray.

Mr. CROSSLAND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2063) to abolish the revenue-marine service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOM-HOUSES.

Mr. CROSSLAND also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2065) to abolish certain custom-houses, and to discharge useless officers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. LETITIA CARR.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2066) directing the Committee on Pensions to place upon the pension-rolls the name of Mrs. Letitia Carr; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

OLIVER LUMPHREY.

Mr. FIELD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2067) to restore Oliver Lumphrey, late second lieutenant Forty-third United States Infantry, Veteran Reserve Corps, to his former rank in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired list; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FREE CIRCULATION OF NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. COTTON, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, asking for free circulation of newspapers to subscribers within the counties of their publication; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PAPER CURRENCY.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio, presented the following memorial; which was read, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and other citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, would respectfully represent that they view with alarm the various bills introduced into Congress to increase the irredeemable paper currency of the country, and pray that Congress may not authorize its increase in any form whatsoever.

Your petitioners believe the present volume of currency to be ample for the legitimate industries of the country, and that its inflation would again stimulate wild speculations, promote gambling in stocks and in gold, retard the restoration of the specie standard, and produce in the end general disaster.

Signed by Taylor & Brother, Rowland & Co., Meader Furniture Company, Walsh, Brooks & Kellogg, B. Storer, Briggs Swift, Theodore Cook, and 140 others.

CINCINNATI, February 9, 1874.

CRETACEOUS FLORA OF THE WEST.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and, under the law, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound twenty-five hundred copies in quarto, uniform with the series, of Professor Hayden's final report on the Cretaceous Flora of the West; one thousand copies for the Department of the Interior, one thousand copies for the Smithsonian Institution, and five hundred copies for the office of the United States geological survey of the interior.

ISIDORE DOIGLE AND ROSA DOIGLE WOODRUFF.

Mr. SHELDON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the southern claims commission be directed to send to the House of Representatives the petition, proofs, and papers relating to the claim of Isidore Doigle and Rosa Doigle Woodruff, of the State of Louisiana.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. HYNES. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption at this time, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be directed to inquire into the expenses, disbursements, and general management of the western judicial district of Arkansas, since its reorganization in 1871.

I desire to say, with permission of the House, that in view of all that has been published in the press of the country about malfeasance and extravagance in the disbursements of the western district of Arkansas, sometimes charging abuses with particular specifications, I have deemed it my duty, representing, as I do, all this territory within my State embraced in this district, to offer this resolution. I am aware of the extraordinary character of the western district of Arkansas, embracing, as it does, more than one-half the State of Arkansas and all of the Indian Territory with jurisdiction extending from that of a police court to that of a circuit court of the United States; and I hope that these unusual circumstances of territory and jurisdiction will satisfactorily explain the great expense of running it. However that may be, if abuses exist we have a right to demand their correction; if not, the administration of the law in that district should be vindicated. It may be proper for me to add that I am seconded in this matter by the Attorney-General, who invites the action of the committee which my resolution directs.

No objection being made, the resolution was received and adopted.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES BY RAILROADS.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of G. G. Hubbard, concerning commerce by railroad among the several States; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

DELINQUENT CLERKS OF DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. SPEER. I ask consent to submit for adoption at this time a preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by section 3 of the act of 1853, chapter 80, district attorneys, clerks of the district and circuit courts, and marshals are required "upon the 1st days of January and July in each year, commencing with the 1st day of July next, or within thirty days from and after the dates specified," to make a "return in writing, embracing all the fees and emoluments of their respective offices of every name and character;" and whereas the Attorney-General in his last report "calls the attention of Congress to the fact that E. V. C. Blake, clerk of the district court for the middle district of Alabama, James McPherson, clerk of the district court for the southern district of Georgia, and George P. Bowen, clerk of the district court for the southern district of Illinois, have persistently disregarded this law, and the frequent demands upon them by this Department for compliance with it," and further states that these officers are beyond his control, and he has "on several occasions complained to the judges of said courts of these delinquents but without avail:" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, required to investigate the cause of the failure or refusal of E. V. C. Blake, James McPherson, and George P. Bowen, to comply with the law, and the frequent demands of the Department of Justice upon them to make a "return in writing embracing all the fees and emoluments of their respective offices of every name and character," and to report the facts to this House, with what, if any, change in existing law is necessary to protect the interests of the Government, and to secure a faithful performance of their duty by the officers of the United States courts.

Mr. SPEER. In the preamble of this resolution I have adopted the exact language of the Attorney-General, as found in his report of 1873.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman that if this committee is to be authorized to investigate, we should also authorize it to send for persons and papers.

Mr. SPEER. Let that clause be added.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be so modified, and as modified will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection; and the resolution, as modified, was accordingly adopted.

Mr. SPEER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to ask the House to make an order that House bill No. 1572, to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, be made a special order in Committee of the Whole, to the exclusion of all other orders, after the morning hour on Thursday, the 19th instant, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, would not that exclude the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. If the House adopts the order, it will exclude all other business while this is pending.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will not make this order.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the order will not be made to the exclusion of private-bill day.

Mr. BECK. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has not the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means—not the tax bill, but the $44,000,000 bill—been made a special order in advance of this; and would this order exclude the consideration of that bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill to which the gentleman from Kentucky refers, legalizing the issue of the $44,000,000 called the "reserve," is the next special order in Committee of the Whole to that which the committee already has under consideration. The bill in reference to the tax on matches is the first; and the next is the $44,000,000 bill. But should the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee prevail, it will set both those bills aside during the pendency of this bill from the Committee on Banking and Currency; and after that had been disposed of they would resume their place.

Mr. BECK. For that reason I shall object to this proposition, unless the motion should be made to suspend the rules, which I hope will not prevail.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to ask a parliamentary question. Inasmuch as the $44,000,000 bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and which is a special order, relates to the currency, would not all the bills relating to that subject come under consideration in general debate when that bill shall be reached; and could not the object of the gentleman from Tennessee be thus arrived at without interfering with the existing special order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair imagines that the limit of general debate on both measures would be about the same.

Mr. KELLEY. Permit me to inquire further whether, in that event, any bill already referred—either this bill, or that I had the honor to present, or that which relates to a postal savings-bank system, or any other bill on the subject of currency—would not be legitimate not only as a subject for discussion, but as a substitute for the pending measure?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, literally and strictly, one bill on the Calendar cannot be taken up and moved as a substitute for another; but by a change so slight as not to affect the substance of the bill, the rule could be evaded; and, practically, the course which the gentleman from Pennsylvania indicates could be adopted. The House in sending a bill to a committee indicates its desire to have the bill considered by the committee; and a bill which has been so disposed of cannot be recognized as a legitimate amendment; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not need to be informed that a very slight change in the phraseology of a bill would evade this parliamentary rule.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say that if this order shall be made, it is my purpose to have general debate upon the bill, so far as the House may think proper—a reasonable debate; we all understand what that means—and then to ask that general debate be closed, and the bill be considered under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was in error in one point. He finds, by reference to the Calendar, that the bill to repeal the stamp duty or tax on matches is now the pending special order; and the next is the bill to repeal all stamp taxation on bank-checks and friction matches. Next comes the forty-four million bill.

Mr. DAWES. The two bills in relation to matches are treated as one.

The SPEAKER. They may be treated as one; but they are in fact two bills.

Mr. COX. Will not one objection prevent this proposed order from being made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] intends to test the question by a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COX. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. BECK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, which takes precedence of debate, which is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BECK. If this bill from the Committee on Banking and Currency be made a special order, to the exclusion of all other business, will it not, while it holds its place, deprive the Committee on Ways and Means of all control of bills which are now ahead of it?

The SPEAKER. The scope of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee will appear by merely reciting it. It is, that on Thursday, the 19th instant, the House, in Committee of the Whole, shall consider, as a special order, the bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, and from day to day until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other orders. This of course would, during its consideration, suspend all other business.

Mr. COX. I do not rise to debate, but to object, because it was understood on all hands debate should go to all bills, and they should come up in the order in which they were assigned in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If that is not done, I must insist on my objection.

Mr. BECK. I have objected already.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say only one word. According to the prevailing custom, which I think a good one, Fridays and Saturdays are assigned to private bills, and we are substantially cut out of handling appropriation bills on those days.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope we will have some order in the House.

The SPEAKER called the House to order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I was about saying that according to what I consider a thoroughly good habit which the House has fallen into under the revised rules, Friday of each week is given up by common consent to private bills, except on the day when it is devoted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Saturday, thus far, has gone to general debate. Monday is a day on which we have thus far been able to do no legislation except under suspension of the rules. The morning hour of the other days of the week is devoted, as it should be, to the regular call of committees. We are now left to nothing but Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays, and that after the morning hour, for the work of the Committee on Appropriations. The largest bill of the session, the most difficult of all, we hope to lay before the House before the day is ended. If, now, a special order is made to the exclusion of all other orders, it means that at least for two weeks not one inch of advance shall be made in the appropriation bills. Only three have been acted on, and nine or ten remain which must be acted on. If we hope to have anything like an early adjournment, if we hope to get our bills through here so they will not be crowded into the last week, we must not make any special order which excludes appropriation bills. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Tennessee, in his motion, will exclude regular appropriation bills. If he does not, I hope the House will refuse to grant the request he makes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to know whether, if this special order is made as it has been requested, it will exclude private-bill days?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the House on Friday should refuse to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. If the House should refuse to go into Committee of the Whole House, it would then be the duty of the Chair, if made, to submit the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The Chair has given notice, since the recent order changing the rules consigning everything containing appropriation of money or property of the United States to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, or to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as the case may be, that he considers it his duty on Friday to recognize, first, the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Would that be the rule on Friday of every week?

The SPEAKER. It would be on Friday of every week, because it is for the majority of the House to say whether they will go into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar to consider private bills or not. If the House refuses to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, then other things can come up.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is that to the exclusion of the District business?

The SPEAKER. That is excepted. The rules provide for the consideration of the District of Columbia business on the third Friday of the month, at two o'clock.

Mr. HYNES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and it is this: whether the operation of this special order, if made, will exclude privileged questions, such as reports from the Committee on Elections in contested-election cases.

The SPEAKER. Those cases belong to the House, while the special order is proposed to be made in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The special order in committee would not affect those election cases.

Mr. MAYNARD. I of course have no more personal feeling in this than any other man in the House, but as the representative of the committee which has charge of the subject of banking and currency I deem it proper to say that committee has been from day to day urged to have this matter brought before the House for discussion and action. There is an opinion widely entertained in portions of the country that some measure should be adopted by Congress touching the great subject of currency. The committee have brought forward this bill as the result of their deliberations, and have invited the attention of the House and the country to it. If the House, or any gentleman in the House, can propose anything better, we are entirely willing to accept it.

Mr. BECK. I object to debate; and let us test the sense of the House now.

Mr. MAYNARD. Objection comes with questionable grace from the gentleman from Kentucky, who was permitted by my courtesy to make his suggestion to the House.

Mr. BECK. I rose to a parliamentary inquiry. If the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is also allowed to be heard, I do not object to the gentleman from Tennessee being heard.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have not objected to any gentleman speaking; but inasmuch as objection has been made and insisted on, I shall ask the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, moves that the rules be so suspended that House bill No. 1572, reported from that committee, be made the special order for Thursday, the 19th instant, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and from day to day until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other orders. Is there a second?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 75.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, Will the House suspend the rules so as to make House bill No. 1572 a special order for Thursday, in Committee of the Whole, and from day to day until disposed of?

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question being put on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 39.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 90, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Berry, Biery, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Buckner, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Creamer, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Alexander M. Wilson, Woodford, and Pierce M. B. Young—56.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Will it be in order, before the House goes into Committee of the Whole, for a majority of the House to set aside previous orders that have been made such, so that this order may be reached?

The SPEAKER. A majority vote can do so any day when the motion to go into Committee of the Whole is pending.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I give notice to the House that a majority having been shown by the vote just taken to be manifestly in favor of making this a special order, I will on Thursday next, if I can get the floor to make the motion, endeavor to get that done, so that when the House goes into Committee of the Whole on that day it shall be on this bill.

MILITARY BOUNTY-LAND DISTRICTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is reminded by the Clerk that a resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri under a suspension of the rules comes over. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of the Interior be required to furnish this House with the names of soldiers and others to whom patents were issued for land lying in the military bounty-land districts in the States of Missouri and Arkansas for service in the war of 1812, the number of the warrant, the description of the land granted to each, with the date of the patent, place of residence of each soldier, company, and regiment in which they severally served, and to whom the patent was delivered, and the date when each patent was delivered.

Mr. KELLOGG. How does this resolution come before the House?

The SPEAKER. It was moved under a suspension of the rules two weeks ago. By an inadvertence it was not taken up last Monday.

Mr. KELLOGG. The only objection I have to the resolution is that it will take up the time of the clerks of the Departments. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. COMINGO. I should prefer having the resolution adopted.

The question was on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. KELLOGG, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. COMINGO.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes not counted.

Mr. COMINGO. I do not ask for further count. I withdraw the demand for a suspension of the rules, and will consent to the resolution being referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

There was no objection, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

CENTENNIAL COMMEMORATION.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the rules be suspended and the following resolution adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives will assemble in the Carpenters' Hall, Philadelphia, in informal joint session, on Monday, the 6th day of September, 1874, in centennial commemoration of the assembling of the delegates chosen and appointed by the several Colonies and Provinces of North America to meet and hold a Congress in Philadelphia, in that hall, on Monday, the 5th day of September, 1774; and that Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House of Representatives be invited to preside over the meeting, and Hon. HENRY WILSON, Vice-President of the United States, be requested to deliver an address appropriate to the occasion.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that I submit this resolution from a sense of the inherent propriety of commemorating by some congressional action the centennial anniversary of the assembling of the Delegates chosen and appointed by the Colonies and Provinces of North America in Congress in Carpenters' Hall, in Philadelphia, and also in pursuance of the invitation of the Carpenters' Association of Philadelphia to this Congress to assemble in their hall on the centennial anniversary of that event.

Sir, that hall is memorable for many reasons. When the Delegates from the Colonies and Provinces found themselves in Pennsylvania they found the state-house, a royal building, closed against them. The Carpenters' Society, which had been long incorporated, composed, as it was, chiefly of people devoted to peace, members of the Society of Friends, known as Quakers, put their hall at the service of the Delegates, and the Continental Congress assembled under these peaceful auspices to inaugurate proceedings which were to result in seven long years of war, and the acknowledgment of American Independence.

Gentlemen will observe that the resolution contemplates no possible expenditure of money by the Government, nor does it bind the members of the House or the Senate to attend. It proposes a voluntary celebration of the day by such members of the two Houses as may be patriotically moved to mark that day. Therefore I do not see how any gentleman may object to this voluntary commemoration of the day.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to be interrupted for question or suggestion; when I am through I will gladly answer any question the gentleman desires to ask, or yield to him for remarks.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does not this proceed by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is speaking by consent of the House.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not wish to shut the gentleman off, as I knew I could do very readily; but just at this point a pertinent question occurred to me, and instead of shutting him off I desire to ask him that question.

Mr. KELLEY. I have said already that when I have concluded my remarks I will answer any question the gentleman wishes to put to me; but I do think I might be permitted to continue the very brief remarks I am about to submit without interruptions of this character.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman knows that he cannot speak without unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. Well; being in the gentleman's power, I yield for his question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then I object; but I do not object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania continuing his remarks.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I was remarking that as this resolution neither binds individual members, nor Congress, nor the Government, to any expenditure, I could not see what legitimate objection could be made to passing it. Such a commemoration will be fitting at the end of each succeeding century in the life of our country; but never, sir, more fitting than now. As the century draws to a close we find that time is healing the wounds of the bloodiest war of history; I say the bloodiest war, and I add the grandest war of history; a war in which armies, large as ever met before, contended over bloodier fields for more successive days than the heroes of any preceding war; a war which, when it drew to a close, returned to civil life in the vigor of young manhood an army of veterans, whose service, measured by the sanguinary conflicts in which they had been engaged, made them veterans in a high degree beyond the older soldiers of Great Britain and Europe. And, sir, with the close of the century we come to a day that belongs to the common glory of the soldiers of the contending armies; and as an act of patriotism, as an act fraught with healing balm to a wounded country, it will be well for the soldiers of the North and of the South, the people of both sections, to commemorate the day which marked the beginning of their common heritage of glory. And, sir, I know the occasion will be gladly accepted by the soldiers on both sides of this House.

Sir, preceding the assembling in Carpenters' Hall, Philadelphia, which I propose we shall commemorate, one of the Southern States had sent out its declaration of independence in such ringing terms and terse sentences as to have given Mr. Jefferson the draught for his memorable Declaration of Independence. Sir, there is upon this floor a soldier of the rebellion whose lineal ancestor, General Francis Nash, sleeps in the Mennonite grave-yard at Germantown within a few feet of where he fell leading a brigade of troops from south of the Potomac. I would like to hear what he thinks of the propriety of celebrating this day; and therefore I yield to my friend from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] for a few minutes.

Mr. WADDELL. Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate, as a graceful compliment to the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, this kindly and courteous invitation extended to me by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to say a few words in support of his resolution. He has been pleased to allude to an event in the revolutionary history of my State which has always been cherished as a just source of pride by her people. I hope I may be pardoned for alluding to a still earlier event of which they are equally proud. As early as 1766, and therefore long before the Boston tea-party, her citizens, not masked or under cover of night, but in the broad light of day, successfully resisted the landing of British stamps on American soil, burned the ship which brought them over, and compelled the stamp-master to take an oath in public that he would not attempt to execute the duties of his office.

More than twelve months previous to the 4th day of July, 1776, when the old bell of Independence Hall, in Philadelphia, proclaimed "liberty throughout the land, and to the inhabitants thereof," as my friend from Pennsylvania has already said, the citizens of North Carolina promulgated the first declaration of American Independence, at Charlotte, in Mecklenburgh County. Therefore, without alluding to other events in our revolutionary history, I am justified in saying that North Carolina may rightfully claim an active participation in any celebration of the deeds which led to the establishment of this Republic. Her Representatives on this floor will ever cheerfully and cordially support the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, having that object in view. I think that is a most happy suggestion of what is almost a positive duty on the part of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, if there is ever to be an occasion in our history when the recollections of our late strife and bloodshed may be swallowed up in the more glorious memories of the struggles in which our forefathers engaged; if there is ever to be a time when the representatives of the American people may meet cordially as friends, and each, speaking for himself and his constituents, may take the other by the hand and say, "Let bygones be bygones; henceforth we will, as our forefathers did, stand united in the determination to establish justice and promote the welfare of our common country;" if any event more than another is calculated to give life to kindly and patriotic feelings among all classes of our citizens in all parts of our country, it seems to me it would be a reunion such as this proposed in the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to be held in the Carpenters' Hall in Philadelphia.

In my judgment it is not mere sentimentalism to support this proposition. There is a sentiment in it, but it is that sort of sentiment which preserves the liberties and advances the honor and the glory of a country. I hail with very great pleasure this and every other evidence of a disposition on the part of northern men to keep alive the memories of our earlier history and to cultivate the sentiments which naturally grow out of them.

I again give assurance, no matter what doubt may be entertained by gentlemen here on the question, that in every movement of that sort the southern people will meet you half way. We have never surrendered our share of the glory which attaches to the accomplishment of American independence, to the framing of the Federal Constitution, and to the administration of the affairs of this Government during the larger and nobler period of its existence. They are not only preserved to us upon the pages of history, but they are cherished by us as one of our proudest legacies. No power can take them from us; and we stand ready again, if permitted, to contribute our share to make the future history of our country worthy of its past.

It is unfortunately true that owing to our crippled resources we cannot contribute so much to the coffers of the nation as formerly. But a little sympathy, a little encouragement, a little stretching forth of the fraternal hand will not only give a new energy to our material growth, but will kindle the flame that now but feebly flickers in the southern heart.

I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for offering this resolution. Let Congress meet in general convention in that venerable hall on the day designated. Let the orator of the occasion speak with healing in his words, with a power that shall arouse the slumbering spirit of other days, that shall revive a faltering faith and unseal once more that fountain, whose waters, however hidden or obstructed, still perpetually well up in every true American heart. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for giving me an opportunity to express the sentiments of the people of my State on this subject, and to say that I hope his resolution will be adopted.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE]—for how long?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Only a very few minutes. In order that the House may know exactly what is before it, I ask that the resolution be again read.

The Clerk again read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives will assemble in the Carpenters' Hall, Philadelphia, in informal joint session, on Monday, the 6th day of September, 1874, in centennial commemoration of the assembling of the delegates chosen and appointed by the several Colonies and Provinces of North America to meet and hold a Congress in Philadelphia, in that hall, on Monday, the 5th day of September, 1774; and that Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House of Representatives, be invited to preside over the meeting, and Hon. HENRY WILSON, Vice-President of the United States, be requested to deliver an address appropriate to the occasion.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I need not say, what is apparent here undoubtedly to everybody, that this is a wholly unprecedented act; that the Congress of the United States, the Senate and House of Representatives, on a day when in all likelihood it will not be in session, but will have dispersed and the members shall have gone to their homes, shall meet in a body to assist in a celebration. I do not think that word "celebration" is used in its proper sense. Granted that it is a great and memorable historical event that is to be celebrated. But yet nothing of the kind has ever been asked before. It is now asked that this, so great a departure from all previous action of Congress, shall be put through here without even having been referred to a committee.

But, sir, the fundamental objection that I have to this proposition is that it is but one of many preparatory measures upon which we will be called upon from time to time to act by the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania on almost every Monday of the session; the end being that Congress shall in some way so commit itself to the great centennial exposition in 1876 (as I believe it is properly and technically called) as to oblige Congress between now and that time to appropriate money to pay the bills for that exposition. This, sir, is the main reason why I object to the resolution. I do not doubt that, if the proposition be adopted, the gentleman from Pennsylvania hereafter, whenever the question of Congress paying the bills may come up, will argue, as he would have a right to do legitimately, that Congress had committed itself, not in terms, to the exposition of 1876, but to the celebration, as a national matter, of the great events which culminated in the declaration of independence on the 4th of July, 1776. Now, sir, if Philadelphia or Pennsylvania wants a celebration in September, 1874, and chooses to get it up, she has my God-speed. If the Speaker of this House and the President of the Senate, the Vice-President of the United States, see fit to go there with all the prestige of the positions they hold, and if the Vice-President chooses to deliver an oration, he has my God-speed. If my fellow-members here choose to attend the celebration in Carpenters' Hall next September, they equally have my God-speed. But when it is proposed that we shall here declare by joint resolution that Congress itself shall assemble there, even informally, as a Congress of the United States, when I know that it is to the end that this same Congress or the next shall be called upon, as I believe, to pay from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 toward the centennial exposition of 1876, I cannot agree to the proposition.

I have not the vanity to suppose, after what took place two or three weeks ago, that any single word of mine will avail much against this proposition. I can only appeal to gentlemen to look at the subject in a fair, candid view, and ask themselves whether they believe it befitting the dignity of the American Congress to lend itself to what must, as I believe, be claimed as the legitimate result of this action.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I admit the correctness of some of the suggestions of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] I freely admit that this action is unprecedented, because the occasion in question will be the first centennial anniversary, and no precedent can have been established. I think, sir, that if the gentleman should live a hundred years and should then be a member of this House, potent as he is now, then if we should fail to pass this resolution to-day, he may make the point that the proposition is unprecedented. But, sir, I believe that with the flow of each recurring century the precedent we are now, I hope, to establish, will be followed.

I yield the floor to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HERNDON.]

Mr. HERNDON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] for yielding me a few minutes to express my views on the resolution. It is proper that every section of the country should be heard from on this subject. Representing in part an extreme portion of the Union, one far removed from the birth-place of our nation, I am glad to find my sentiments in accord with this resolution and to be able to give it my hearty support.

I know nothing of the sinister views attributed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania by the gentleman from Maine. The latter gentleman, as I understand, opposes this resolution upon the score of economy. I am glad to find him in favor of a policy of strict economy. No man on this floor would go farther than myself to help in that laudable direction. But, Mr. Speaker, this is not a subject for the exhibition of economy. This proposition does not require one single dollar to be taken out of the Treasury of the United States. It proposes merely an informal meeting of both Houses of Congress at Philadelphia, on the 5th of September, 1874. If it were proposed by this resolution, or any subsequent resolution, to take money out of the Treasury to defray the expenses of that meeting, I should most certainly vote against it; for I believe that if such a matter were involved it would mar the harmony and beauty of the sentiment contained in the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, one hundred years ago, on the 5th day of next September, the first Congress of States met on this continent in a hall owned by some mechanics in the city of Philadelphia. That Congress was called to meet by a single State; and it was the first bold, defiant confederative act of the colonists for freedom. That day marked an important event in our history; the foundation was there laid for a mighty national fabric, which has been constantly added to, until we find ourselves to-day as their successors in the grandest Capitol of earth. With but a handful of Representatives from the then thirteen Colonies, containing about two million six hundred thousand souls, we have increased to two hundred and ninety-two Representatives, seventy-four Senators, thirty-seven States, ten Territories, forty million people, and about forty billions of wealth. But the rapid increase in other directions—material, intellectual, and moral advancement—is still more marked and satisfactory, and cannot fail when contemplated to cause the heart of every true American to swell with emotions of gratitude.

It is right for nations as well as individuals to have their anniveresaries, memorials, and fixed days to celebrate great events and achievements, in order that they may pause in their career, revive the recollections of the past, view the present, renew old pledges, make new vows, that they may be armed with higher incentives and nobler aims for the true elevation of mankind in the scale of being. The wise men who met in that Congress predicted that it would be the first of a long line of successive Congresses that would meet for generations to come, and establish precedents for all time. And how truly prophetic was that declaration! It is difficult, if not impossible, to estimate the influence and power exercised by the wisdom of the first and succeeding Congresses in molding the destinies of this great nation. The first Congress proved to be the refuge and hope of the colonists in their early struggles, and the sheet-anchor of American liberty, as its successors have proven to be the great central, moving, and regulating power of the General Government. It was the precursor of all that followed. It was the evidence of a common will to resent a common enemy. It prepared the way by successive resolutions which led to and culminated in the immortal Declaration of Independence soon after. Whatever of glory and enduring fame may attach to the Declaration itself must be largely attributed to the boldness, wisdom, and true heroism of the first Congress. And if the 4th day of July should be celebrated as the birthday of our national Independence, why should not the 5th day of September, 1874, be commemorated as the centennial of an event but second in importance to that, and claiming our highest consideration? Sir, I believe it to be a fitting day for commemoration as contemplated by this resolution.

The centennial of the first Congress is special in its nature, and confined to our own people; it marks an event which led to great consequences, and is to be held at a place where the representatives of the nation and the people can meet on hallowed ground, and, forgetting all past differences, renew that fraternal feeling and patriotic devotion to the country and its institutions which must ever form the strongest bond of our Union. The centennial of our Independence is wider in its scope and influence; it deeply concerns every individual of the nation. But it does much more; it affects every nationality of the earth, and I hope all nations may be fitly represented on that occasion. There is no incompatibility between celebrating both days; they perfectly harmonize; the one precedes and prepares the way for the other, just as the first Congress led to the Declaration of Independence. I hope to see the day and place fixed by the wisdom and patriotism of this Congress for the commemoration in all time of the meeting of the first Congress on this continent, where many centennials shall be celebrated by the assembled millions of freemen in recounting the vast changes and improvements that have been wrought in the civilization of our people and the science of our government.

Mr. Speaker, I trust I shall be pardoned for alluding briefly and more specially to the position of Texas in reference to this resolution. She occupies a different attitude in some respects from that of any other State in the Union. The Thirteen Colonies determined to be free, and became so by their united valor and patriotism. The territory of other States has been acquired by the common blood and treasure of the whole country, and new States have been successively formed out of this territory and admitted into the Union. But Texas was acquired by no such method. She, like the Colonies, was tributary to a mother country which sought her oppression and degradation. She resisted that tyranny; declared her independence in 1836; drew the sword in defense of her rights; vanquished the Mexican army at San Jacinto, and carved out for herself a magnificent empire larger than Japan. The battle-flag that waved triumphantly over the bloody field of San Jacinto was recognized as the emblem of her nationality on the high seas and in the harbors and capitals of the nations of the world. She has her own hallowed days to celebrate her battles and victories, her heroism and great achievements, that are distinct in themselves and dear to the hearts of her people. At the end of ten years of success as an independent republic, marching in the race of civilization and national greatness, she yielded to a faith as strong as it was noble and praiseworthy. Believing in a common destiny for the people of the western continent, in one grand republic embracing all people on it, with the freest, wisest, and best institutions of earth, and with an ardent desire to aid in hastening that ultimate destiny, she sacrificed on the altar of self-denial all selfishness, renounced her nationality, and freely and willingly annexed herself to the Union, and from motives of true patriotism became a part of this great Government.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I would like to ask the gentleman a single question, which is in the line of his argument. Suppose we should decide to meet in Philadelphia on the day suggested, and in the mean time any occasion should arise for which the President should call upon Congress to assemble in special session, would not this action, committing us to a meeting in Philadelphia in joint convention in the way suggested, prevent our meeting here to take measures for the emergency?

Mr. HERNDON. I understand it would not, for this reason: In the first place we can, if necessary, rescind this resolution. In the second place, as Philadelphia is only a few hours' ride from this point, we could meet there, celebrate the day, and return here within twenty-four hours. But if we could not, as suggested by a friend near me, we could obey the law, at all events.

Sir, whatever there may be of prestige, heroism, or glory that clusters around the history and achievements of this Government in other days, and that is shared in by States who were the actors in those scenes, or that may have been inherited by other States afterward admitted, became of right the common property of Texas by choice and adoption. From the day she linked her destiny with that of the Federal Government, with but a single exception, she has cherished but one sentiment, and that has been to make this the grandest and noblest republic of earth. Never did she falter but once, and then under an ordeal too strong for a free people to resist. But even here she illustrated, both in civil life and on the field, that she had lost none of those sterling qualities, such as self-denial, virtue, statesmanship, and military prowess that in other days had acquired for her a fame and a place among all nationalities. These dark days, with the pitiless storms of passion that swayed our people to and fro, with all the sadness and distress that followed, and hung like the pall of death for long, weary years over our land, I rejoice to-day are rapidly yielding to the smiles of peace, and the returning acts of justice accorded our people from other sections of the Union. Whatever our people may have done for political reasons during the late war, whatever of envy or malice these acts may have engendered in the minds of others, and what may be the present estimate placed upon their attachment to the Union because of this, I know not. But, Mr. Speaker, one thing I do know, that whatever may be the estimation in which we are held by others, or whatever our people may have said or done, or lost or suffered, there is one thing of which I can assure the country, that they never lost their virtue, their courage, or their honor.

Every sentiment of my nature is common with that of the South and her dearest interests; every pulsation of my heart beats in unison with that of my people; I shared with them their joys and suffered in common with them in their sorrows, distress, and losses, and believe that I truly represent them when I declare on this floor that no State or people would, to-day, resist an insult to our national flag quicker or draw the sword sooner in defense of the national honor than the people of Texas. They love their own Texas with its history, its memories, the graves of its heroes and their fame—for what it has been, and for its brightening prospects as the future home of millions. But they love the Federal Government also, for with her destiny is the destiny of Texas linked for weal or woe. And I am glad that we are about to fix a national festival, a day for national commemoration, a day that will revive national recollections of sterling virtue and noble patriotism; and at a place where every section of the Union can feel is common and hallowed ground; where all our past strife, discord, and bitterness may be sacrificed and forgotten on the altar of a common and united country; where, I trust, a lofty, more generous, and noble patriotism shall animate our people and add fresh energy to our national growth, unite us in closer bonds of interest and fraternal feeling, and enable our descendants to celebrate the centennial with the same united and unbrokon Republic, with her teeming millions of freemen advanced as far beyond this day in all that tends to elevate man in the scale of being as we feel that we have advanced beyond the condition of our ancestors, whose representatives met in the first Congress of this continent, one hundred years ago.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WHITEHEAD.]

Mr. CREAMER. I object to any more of this speech-making. I understand that we appropriate Saturdays to such purposes. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. KELLEY. I am very sorry the gentleman objects to debate. I move to suspend the rules and put the resolution on its passage.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will consent to have this resolution referred to the Centennial Committee, of which he is chairman. As we all know, the Vice-President of the United States is in very feeble health, and it is extremely doubtful whether he would feel justified in accepting the invitation. Besides, I submit it would be an act of great disrespect to send to the Senate a resolution for a joint convention proposing that the Speaker of the House should preside over it. I hope that the resolution will be referred.

Mr. KELLEY. I can only say to the gentleman that I have consulted some of the best parliamentarians in the House, and they seemed to think that the proper order was adopted in the resolution.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to name a skillful parliamentarian who would say it is becoming in us to propose to the Senate a joint convention over which the Speaker was to be the presiding officer?

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to answer the gentleman's question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution. Is there a second?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KELLEY and Mr. CREAMER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 56.

So there was a second.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 91, not voting 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Ashe, Bell, Biery, Bright, Buckner, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clinton L. So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended, and the resolution was not passed.

During the vote,

Mr. STORM stated that his colleague, Mr. RANDALL, who was unavoidably absent, would have voted if present in the affirmative.

Mr. STARKWEATHER made a similar statement in behalf of his colleague, Mr. BARNUM.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

STEAM NAVIGATION.

Mr. KASSON obtained the floor.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move, in behalf of the Committee on Commerce, that the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871, be made a special order for Tuesday next, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in subordination to regular appropriation bills.

Mr. McCRARY. Will it be a special order in subordination also to election cases?

The SPEAKER. Those cases are in the House, and it is proposed only to make this a special order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. KASSON. I cannot yield if the yeas and nays are to be called on it.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will permit me to proceed, as this is a matter of interest to the whole country.

Mr. KASSON. If it does not give rise to a demand for the yeas and nays I will not object.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is in reference to passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.

The SPEAKER. It is proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make the bill a special order in Committee of the Whole for Tuesday next.

Mr. DAWES. Does it in any way affect the other special orders?

The SPEAKER. It does not. It will be subordinate to special orders in committee which have already been made.

There was no objection, and the special order was made as indicated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed without amendment an act (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 149) for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation;

An act (S. No. 238) permitting James McDonald, a warrant officer of the Navy, to accept a silver medal from the government of Italy;

An act (S. No. 254) to donate the military reservation at Fort Steilacoom, in the Territory of Washington, for the use of the insane asylum;

An act (S. No. 310) for the relief of W. W. Elliott;

An act (S. No. 311) for the relief of Joseph Montanari, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 316) granting a pension to Elizabeth F. Thompson;

An act (S. No. 317) for the relief of Henry G. Smith, of Indianapolis, Indiana;

An act (S. No. 341) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith; and

An act (S. No. 439) to provide for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for service in carrying the United States mails.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended and the following resolution adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in the consideration of the pension appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole, it shall be in order to move an amendment providing for the payment of pensions to all classes of disabled soldiers and sailors and other pensioners by checks and drafts through the post-office, in an economical and efficient manner.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like a moment to say to the House that the object of this resolution is only to make such an amendment in order when the pension appropriation bill comes up. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have an amendment of that character under consideration. The Judiciary Committee have also one under consideration.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded, the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting therefor,) and the resolution was adopted.

PAYMENT TO C. H. EVANS.

Mr. DAWES. During the last Congress the Secretary of the Treasury detailed a clerk to aid the Committee on Ways and Means in searching for statistics. He spent a great deal of time, night and day, on the work, and the committee recommended to the House a resolution to compensate him for his services for his extra time, which was adopted. I will read it:

That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, to C. H. Evans, statistician, the sum of $500, for services rendered to the Committee on Ways and Means for procuring statistics during the present session of Congress.

Mr. Evans, however, did not apply for his money until after the contingent fund was closed. I now again submit the resolution in order that he may have his pay.

Mr. CONGER. Were those the statistics which the gentleman from Massachusetts used in his speech the other day? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. They were not.

Mr. CONGER. I would be opposed to paying anything for getting up that kind of statistics.

Mr. DAWES. I think that this poor clerk should not suffer for any shortcomings of mine. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the following resolution be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, to C. H Evans, statistician, the sum of $500, for services rendered to the Committee on Ways and Means in procuring statistics during the Forty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that it is not lawful to pay this out of the contingent fund.

Mr. DAWES. It was suggested by the Clerk that this was the proper method of making the payment.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Were these services in addition to the duties which Mr. Evans performed at the Treasury Department?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir; and they were performed out of office hours, at night. Those gentlemen who were members of the Committee on Ways and Means at that time will be ready to testify, I have no doubt, to the amount of services rendered.

Mr. COX. They never took any duties off in consequence of those services. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. It was Mr. Evans who prepared the whole list of dutiable articles in the last Congress.

Mr. COX. Did this getting up of statistics do any good, whether in regard to the duties on tea or coffee, or stamp tax, or anything else?

Mr. DAWES. I submit that this is a simple act of justice. If the House do not see the matter as I do let them say so.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded, the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting therefor,) and the resolution was adopted.

PHILADELPHIA NAVAL ASYLUM.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, in pursuance of an act of Congress passed in the year 1811, a commission, consisting of the Secretaries of the Navy, Treasury, and War, was constituted and authorized to provide a permanent naval asylum for destitute and decrepit naval officers, seamen, and marines; and whereas, in pursuance of said authority, a naval asylum was established at Philadelphia; and whereas the said city now entirely surrounds said asylum, and the present site has therefore become entirely unsuitable for such asylum; and whereas the health and comfort of the brave men who imperiled their lives for their country would be highly promoted by a removal of said asylum to Annapolis, where the locality, scenery, and surroundings pre-eminently fit it as a site for such an institution; and whereas the sale of said asylum would be a measure of great economy, as said buildings and grounds are very valuable, and from the funds thereof suitable buildings could be erected at Annapolis and leave a large balance for the Treasury: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, directed to inform this House of the propriety of a sale of the Naval Asylum in Philadelphia, and the erection of suitable buildings on the grounds adjacent to the Naval Academy at Annapolis belonging to the Government, for the purposes of a naval asylum; and also to communicate any information he may have on the subject.

Mr. KILLINGER. I object to the resolution being adopted; but I would have no objection to its being referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I send to the desk a letter from the Admiral of the Navy, which I ask to have read.

Mr. KILLINGER. I object.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask that the resolution, and the letter of the Admiral of the Navy be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I also ask that the letter of the Admiral of the Navy be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ADMIRAL,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I received your note of the 9th instant this morning, in relation to the propriety of disposing of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia.

I can give you little information about this matter beyond expressing my own views.

It has long been evident to officers of the Navy that the Naval Asylum is the most improperly located building under the Government, and I have always been an advocate for its removal to Annapolis.

While I was superintendent of the Naval Academy at Annapolis I purchased for the Government a farm of about one hundred acres, having in view at the time the erection of a hospital for the Academy and a position for the Naval Asylum looking down the bay and overlooking the Severn River. The hospital has been built and is a great addition to the Naval Academy but the asylum seems to remain a fixture at Philadelphia, where it is entirely out of place: first, because of its unhealthy location; second, because the center of the city is no place for old sailors, who love to look upon the water and pass their leisure time in fishing and rowing.

The location near the Naval Academy holds out every inducement to change the asylum to that place, where the lives of the old sailors would pass away to their entire satisfaction. The present location only breeds sickness and discontent.

The ground on which the present asylum is built is now worth a very large sum, and would sell for much more than would erect a building in Annapolis twice its size; and this should be done without delay.

You are aware, I presume, that the asylum is little or no expense to the Government, as it is at present supported from the interest on prize-money belonging to the naval-pension fund. The property, land, and buildings at the present asylum are worth at least $1,250,000. As the Government owns the land at Annapolis, a much more convenient and commodious building could be put up for $600,000, and what is left from the sale could remain as a fund for the use of the asylum.

Medical Director Pinkney, of the Navy, once wrote to me on this subject, and I give a quotation from his letter which covers all the ground. His letter, in the Report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1871, pages 60 and 61, will be found very interesting. I quote:

"At Annapolis there is a choice spot for a naval asylum. The locality, scenery, and surroundings are such as to commend it to the Government as a place pre-eminently suited to be the abode of those old sailors who have spent their best years of life afloat, and who in the evening of their days are entitled to rest within sight of the ocean wave. The capacious grounds will give them both occupation and the exercise essential to health.

"To effect what I suggest, it would be necessary to dispose of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia. Now, it must be obvious to the least thoughtful among us that the present location is totally unsuited to the object the Government has in view. The idea of providing a home for sailors far removed from water scenery and in the immediate vicinity of a large and populous city is absolutely absurd. I say this in no offensive sense. It is a stubborn fact, that cannot be gainsaid. If any feeling of our nature is stronger than another, it is the love the sailor bears to the ocean; and surely the desire to minister to this feeling, when the sailor is too old and infirm to have his home on the mountain wave, is the least a generous Government could offer him at the close of his life. The city of Philadelphia has advanced so far that it now circumvallates the asylum. The property is immensely valuable. The authorities of the city would gladly become the purchasers, and Congress, if appealed to, would not, I am sure, oppose the measure. Out of the funds of the sale a naval asylum could be built at Annapolis of a character to reflect credit on the Government, and leave a handsome balance in the Treasury.

"Establish such an asylum at Annapolis, and organize such a school of [medical] instruction there, and it would prove one of the grandest fields of enterprise upon which the Government could possibly embark, and that, too, within the clearly defined boundaries of its powers. Who of us can estimate the good that would result? It would secure for the service a class of medical men of whom the Government could be justly proud."

You will find, by looking at the act of February 26, 1811, (volume 2, page 650,) or Laws of the Navy, page 22, that the Naval Asylum was built by order of commissioners appointed to decide upon locations for naval hospitals, and the money for building was obtained from a hospital fund deducted from the pay of officers, seamen, and marines, and consequently without expense to the Government of the United States. And the act of Congress provides that the asylum shall be maintained from money arising from the naval prize-fund.

I have said all that I know about this matter, and hope it is what you require.

I remain, very respectfully, yours,

DAVID D. PORTER, Admiral.

Hon. WILLIAM J. O'BRIEN, M. C.

HORN ISLAND.

Mr. LAMAR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas certain parts of an island called Horn Island, lying in the Gulf of Mexico, were, by order of the President, dated August 30, 1847, reserved for military purposes; and whereas said reservation has never been used for any purpose: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Military Committee be instructed to inquire and report upon the advisability of the sale of said reservation to private citizens.

MINTS, ASSAY OFFICES, AND COINAGE.

Mr. HOOPER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a bill to amend the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to the mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873.

The bill was read, as follows:

That the forty-seventh section of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to the mints and assay offices and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that it shall read as follows: "That for the purpose of enabling the mints and assay offices of the United States to make returns to depositors with as little delay as possible, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to keep in the said mints and assay offices, when the state of the Treasury will admit thereof, such an amount of public money or bullion as he shall judge convenient and necessary, out of which those who bring bullion to the said mints and assay offices may be paid the value thereof, less coinage and other mint charges and a reasonable charge for transportation, as soon as practicable after the value has been ascertained; and on payment thereof being made, the bullion so deposited shall become the property of the United States, and may be transferred to any mint or assay office for coinage or conversion into fine bars. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use, as far as he may deem it proper and expedient, for payment to depositors of gold bullion, coin certificates representing coin in the Treasury and issued under the provisions of section 5 of the act entitled 'An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government,' approved March 3, 1863. But the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time withdraw the fund, or any portion thereof, and may also, from time to time, transfer to the office of the assistant treasurer at New York, from the bullion fund of any mint or assay office, refined gold bars, bearing the United States stamp of fineness, weight, and intrinsic value, or bars from any melt of foreign coin or bullion of standard equal to or above that of the United States, and may apply the same, at not less than par, to the redemption of coin certificates or in exchange for gold coins, subject to such regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I must certainly object to that bill being put on its passage now.

Mr. KASSON. Then, objection being made, I resume the floor.

The SPEAKER. Before submitting the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, the Chair will receive bills for reference.

Mr. COX. I desire, if it is in order, to move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first receive bills for reference.

MEANING OF A STATUTE.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2068) declaring the true intent and meaning of a statute; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SURETIES OF JOHN L. ROBINSON.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2069) for the relief of the sureties of John L. Robinson, late United States marshal for the district of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands the bill (H. R. No. 1928) to provide for the more efficient administration of the laws relating to the public lands; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

NAVAL STATION AT PORT ROYAL.

Mr. MAYNARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2070) authorizing the President of the United States to purchase a site for a coaling station, naval depot, and other governmental uses at Port Royal, Beaufort County, South Carolina, and making an appropriation for that purpose; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

WEYMOUTH BEAN.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2071) granting a pension to Weymouth Bean; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPHINE D. THOMAS.

Mr. RUSK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2072) granting a pension to Josephine D. Thomas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING OF DUTIES.

Mr. KASSON. I now move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of considering the bill restricting the refunding of customs duties, and prescribing certain regulations of the Treasury Department.

Mr. COX. I made a motion to adjourn.

Mr. KASSON. Surely the gentleman would not cut me off now when I have been yielding for the accommodation of other members?

Mr. COX. I would not do such a thing for the world, and withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does not this bill go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules it would; but the gentleman proposes to suspend the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that unanimous consent be given to the gentleman from Iowa to explain the bill, reserving the right to object.

The SPEAKER. There is no necessity of reserving the right to object, because the bill cannot be considered in the House except under a suspension of the rules.

The Clerk read the bill. The first section provides that the moneys paid into the hands of any collector, or into the Treasury, from customs duties, in accordance with any decision or ruling previously made by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not be refunded or repaid except in pursuance of special appropriation therefor made by law or in accordance with a judgment of a court of the United States, giving construction to the law, and from which the Attorney-General shall certify that no appeal or writ of error will be taken by the United States. No ruling or decision once made by the Secretary of the Treasury, giving construction to any law imposing customs duties, shall be changed by the same or a succeeding Secretary, unless it be in concurrence with an opinion in favor of such change given by the Attorney-General, or by reason of a judicial decision of a court of the United States affecting the same, from which the Attorney-General shall certify that no appeal or writ of error will be taken by the United States. The second section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report to Congress, shall give a detailed statement of the various sums of money refunded under the provisions of this act, or of any other act of Congress relating to the revenue, together with copies of the rulings under which repayments were made.

Mr. KASSON. With permission of the House I desire not only to state to the House what the bill seeks to accomplish, but also to correct misapprehensions that have gone out, the echoes of which have come back within the past two days, since notice was given of the introduction of this bill. A bill had previously been introduced into the House by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] which proposed that under no circumstances should any money once paid into the Treasury be refunded. I observe from the public prints that the impression prevails that this bill of the Committee on Ways and Means is designed to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury, in all cases, of the power to correct any error of the subordinate officers of the Treasury Department, and to deprive the merchant of all the relief which the law now grants to him without waiting, for the action of Congress. That impression is an error.

Under the law as it now stands it is provided that whenever the Secretary of the Treasury is satisfied that duties have been erroneously paid, he shall have authority to issue his warrant upon the Treasurer to refund duties that have been paid in excess of what he may consider right at the time. The result has been that he not only corrects errors that have been committed prior to the construction of the law made by himself officially, but that construction may be changed from time to time by him and by his successor in office indefinitely; and money is being continually paid out of the Treasury, year by year, as the changing opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury may be made manifest.

The object of the Committee on Ways and Means in directing the reporting of this bill and asking the early action of the House upon it, is to prescribe a limitation upon the now unlimited power of the Secretary of the Treasury. The committee did not deem it right to deprive the merchants of all opportunity for relief, when a law is made and construed as to his liability. Accordingly, whenever any debts are now or hereafter paid, that is if this bill should become a law, a merchant dissatisfied with the duties required of him gives the notice required by law, makes the appeal required by law, and obtains a decision upon the law from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will harmonize conflicting decisions of his subordinates, or correct them, and in that case his money may be paid back to him.

To illustrate the necessity for such a law as this, I will refer to cases which may occur. The collector of Boston rules that one rate of duty should be applied to an imported article; the collector of New York rules that another rate of duty should be applied to the same article. The consequence is that the competing merchants of a particular class of merchandise will introduce their goods into the markets of this country and be obliged to sell them at different rates because of the difference of the cost to the two parties, resulting from the conflicting rulings of the subordinates of the Treasury Department. It is indispensable that such conflicts should be avoided, by having some power to harmonize the rulings of the subordinates of the Treasury Department, and putting merchants of the country upon equal terms.

This bill, therefore, provides that the power shall exist in the Secretary of the Treasury to refund money paid into the Treasury before the first ruling of the Treasury Department upon any law. Beyond that, the bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not change his ruling upon any particular point, or the ruling of his predecessors, or any of them. That ruling may be changed; but, in order to change a ruling once made, it will be necessary that the opinion of a law officer of the Government shall be given in support of the Secretary's opinion, that there should be a change in the construction of the law; or, on the other hand, that there should be a decision of the court, with which the law officer of the Government shall be so satisfied that he will take no appeal from it. In either of these ways the ruling of the Secretary may be changed. But being changed, it will not be within the power of the Secretary, under this bill, to refund any duties once paid in, but he must report the facts to Congress and allow Congress to provide for the liquidation of the claim.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like the bill to go a little farther than I think it does. The gentleman will know whether it reaches an error or a wrong like one which I will specify. Some time ago it was held by one of the Secretaries of the Interior that the revenue law did not extend over the Indian Territory. At that time Mr. Boudinot was engaged in the manufacture of tobacco in the Indian country. He wrote to the Secretary of the Interior to know whether the revenue laws would be enforced in that Territory, and received an answer that they would not be. A change took place in the Secretary's office. A new Secretary was appointed. And so careful was Mr. Boudinot that he wrote to the present Secretary of the Interior, and received an answer to the same effect. Subsequently to that time, and under the order of the Secretary of the Interior, his property was seized, his business broken up, and, in a property point of view, he was absolutely destroyed.

Now, it seems to me that when decisions have been made in such cases, although the change does not involve the taking or refunding of money from the Treasury, yet when a Secretary has ruled upon an important question like the one to which I have referred, that decision should be final until considered and reviewed by some higher authority than the Secretary himself. He should not be allowed to decide one way to-day and another way to-morrow, so as to ruin the business and destroy the prospects of a man, as the business and prospects of Colonel Boudinot were destroyed by the decision of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KASSON. We do not, Mr. Speaker, in this bill change the system of interior revenue collection. The committee chose only to meet the cases which were most pressing now, and which, so far as the principle is concerned, are in the direction to which the gentleman refers. This bill is designed to give steadiness and permanence to the administration of the Treasury Department, requiring the Secretary under certain circumstances to report to Congress before moneys which have once been paid in shall be paid out of the Treasury; and on the other hand protecting the merchant against the action of a subordinate by securing to him the right which he now has of protest and appeal, of obtaining the ruling of the Secretary and having any errors corrected in the first instance.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] whether this proposition does not substantially require every man who has been subjected to an overcharge to sue the United States, and prevent him from receiving repayment except in pursuance of an appropriation?

Mr. KASSON. I answer that it does not, except where it is proposed to change the former deliberate ruling and decision of the Department. In that case it does require the claimant to come to Congress before he can get the money out of the Treasury. To that extent it takes from any one officer the power to deplete the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that about twenty-five hundred suits are now pending for the recovery of overpayments of this kind; and if this bill is likely to add to the number of those suits, it seems to me it will lumber up our courts in a manner very objectionable.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say in the first instance, because it will end the whole debate on that point, that this bill does not affect the question of suits in any particular. The same number will probably exist, whether the bill be or be not passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this question had better be pretty thoroughly considered; and I will give the reason. Let me state, in the first place, exactly what a merchant now has to do before he can obtain any refund of duties from the Treasury Department. He must appeal in writing, setting forth the grounds of his appeal, within ten days after the payment is made. He must first pay the amount demanded, and then he has ten days in which to make a written appeal. He must then bring suit within thirty days. Having brought his suit, he may then apply to the Secretary to reverse the ruling of the subordinate; and if the ruling be reversed, the money is paid back to him without interest. Or if he fails to get the Secretary of the Treasury to reverse the decision, or to send the case to the Attorney-General, he may then go on with his suit and obtain his pay at the end of the litigation.

There were over five thousand cases of appeals last year. Of course the Secretary of the Treasury cannot attend to five thousand appeals; he must leave the matter in most cases to a subordinate, who sometimes decides rightly and sometimes wrongly. If a case is important an appeal is taken to the Secretary himself. This is why there is a lack of uniformity in the decisions.

But while the courts hold, in accordance with decisions of the Supreme Court, that in all cases of taxation if there is any doubt the doubt should be given against the Government, because taxes ought not to be collected from the citizen upon doubtful grounds—while this is the law as administered by the courts, as declared three times by the Supreme Court, and as construed by two Secretaries of the Treasury, one of whom was Chancellor Bibb, of Kentucky, yet the practice with all collectors when they are in doubt is to take the money, because if they do not get the money there is no chance to have an appeal. Thus, upon all doubtful questions the collector decides against the importer, and sends him to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to a court. But no refund can be made without an appeal having been taken and a suit brought.

Mr. KASSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Secretary cannot refund without a suit?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He cannot without an appeal being taken and a suit brought within thirty days.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman is somewhat in error; but I will not interrupt him.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hardly think I am in error. Perhaps I do not know what the law is; but I know what the practice is; and I know of thousands of cases in which one man has had his money paid back, while another has failed to obtain a refund simply because he has not brought a suit. Any gentleman familiar with the business of importation will, I think, bear me out in my statement. I think I can hardly be mistaken.

But this bill proposes that in every such case the party claiming a refund of duty shall come to Congress and ask a special appropriation. How soon he may be able to obtain it everybody knows. That is why I think the bill should be very fully considered. Under the present system the money does not go into the Treasury. It remains as a fund under the control of the Secretary, because if it went into the Treasury it could not be taken out without an act of Congress. It remains under the control of the Secretary, who, when a good case is made out, repays it to the merchant.

There has been the most sedulous guard thrown about this refund from year to year for many years. It has been the system from the beginning down till to-day. I suppose there is no doubt there is not a more onerous question than this one arising under the construction of the law. The collector makes such construction as he can, when a new thing comes up, where a new article is brought before him, and that construction he means to make in favor of the Government by taking the higher rate of duty and leaving the merchant to appeal. Under these circumstances, I think the House ought to consider it longer than they can to-night.

Mr. KASSON. I am happy to say as to that, my whole point has been so far to have the rules suspended so as to consider the bill. I am willing to let it go over to the morning hour to-morrow morning, when it can be fully considered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not wish the morning hour taken up with the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts, if I understood him correctly, he is in error in two or three particulars.

One is as to the length of time. It is not thirty days, as it used to be, but by amendment of the law ninety days, in which suit may be brought.

In reference to the other point, there is absolutely no limitation in section 14 of the act of 1864 on the right of the Secretary to issue his warrant to pay duties which he may decide have been erroneously assessed. The law provides that whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury in any case of unascertained duties, or where under duties heretofore provided more money has been paid to the collector or person acting as such than the law requires, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to draw his warrant on the Treasurer in favor of the person or persons entitled to such payment, directing the Treasurer to refund the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. There is absolute control of all our money which comes into the Treasury under customs duties in the will of the chief of the Treasury Department. The question presented by this bill to this House is whether you will leave that power absolutely within the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the vast amount of business he has already to attend to, or whether you will say a decision once made by the Secretary of the Treasury, thereafter, if he should change his opinion, he shall before he pays money out await an appropriation by Congress.

Let me allude to one single case which has done much to arouse public interest in connection with this matter. In the act imposing duties on fruits passed recently the Secretary of the Treasury, in the month of September, in a case made and coming to him, ruled they were subject to duty, and Congress meant to subject them to duty. Parties made their protest and appealed in the usual way. They went on paying those duties under protest, &c., until hundreds of thousands of dollars accumulated in the Treasury. In December, more than one year afterward, they brought such a power to bear upon this subject, or such new information before the Treasury Department, as to induce it to change its ruling and to declare these moneys had been wrongfully paid, and now at this very moment, while we are debating this question, there are hundreds of thousands of dollars, without any consideration by Congress, with one opinion of the Secretary for and another opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury against it, liable to be paid out of the Treasury in the manner I have stated. Under these circumstances the committee thought it was their duty to call the attention of Congress to these facts so that some remedy might be provided.

Mr. BECK. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa, what is the amount to be paid out of the Treasury by the change in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KASSON. I cannot give the figures—perhaps the gentleman can—but it is a considerable amount.

Mr. BECK. I heard that it was over $2,000,000, but I do not know whether that statement is true or not.

Mr. KASSON. It is said to be about that; that it would involve that amount, but not that amount has been paid out.

Mr. BECK. Yes; it would involve that amount; and that amount is liable to be taken out of the Treasury by this refund.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say, in regard to what the gentleman from Iowa has said, that I do not see he has convicted me of anything of error; and that is all I care about. I say, without protest and appeal, and suit brought within a given time; and I think he will find the statute makes it thirty days.

Mr. KASSON. That is the old statute.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will be prepared on call to show exactly; but whether thirty or ninety days, suit must be brought within the given period, and there must be protest and appeal; that no amount can be paid out at the custom-house or the Secretary's office where there has not been protest and appeal. Where the man pays the money he says "I pay it under protest, because I cannot get my goods otherwise, and I must pay. I pay it under protest, therefore, and take an appeal."

I was about to say further that it is stated that large amounts of money are taken out of the Treasury. Not so. Large amounts are taken out of the money that the Secretary decides never has gone and never ought to go into the Treasury.

Mr. KASSON. I must correct the gentleman from Massachusetts right there. Under the act now existing the money must be paid immediately into the Treasury, and cannot be got out except by a warrant of the Secretary. It is not taken from any fund remaining in the hands of the Secretary.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not mean to say that.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether this is not the law: When a man is obliged to pay a duty which he thinks too large, he pays it under protest, and appeals to the Secretary of the Treasury. If the Secretary of the Treasury decides with him that the amount he paid was too large, the Secretary draws his warrant without any suit and pays it back. The suit is only to be brought when the man has not got such a decision from the Secretary as he is satisfied with. Therefore it is that whenever the Secretary pays out money to the satisfaction of the man who has paid the duty, the United States can never have a decision of the court upon the question whether the construction of the Secretary of the Treasury is right or not, and the money has gone out. That, I think, is the law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say just one single word in answer to my colleague. As these cases are never settled within the thirty or ninety days before the Secretary, there must be a suit brought.

Mr. DAWES. I think my friend is mistaken about that. If a man appeals to the Secretary within the thirty or ninety days, the Secretary may be six months in making up his mind. The suit is only to be brought, and my colleague must see that it need only be brought, when the man who has got the grievance does not get satisfaction from the Secretary; then he commences his suit against the collector for taking away from him money which he says the law does not justify him in taking. That is the process. But if he gets the Secretary of the Treasury to decide in his favor, the Secretary instantly is authorized by law to draw his warrant on the Treasury for the sum of money. And who is to sue? There is nobody to sue. The man has got his money, and has got it back by order of the Secretary, and there is no occasion for a suit.

Mr. KASSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] only remarking that the thirty days refer to the appeals from the collector to the Secretary; the ninety days to the commencement of the suit after the decision of the Secretary.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that no bill ever reported by a committee of which I was a member had my sanction more heartily than this. I believe that it will stop one of the grand leaks of the Treasury, and one that is more promotive of fraud than any other.

We had this instance before us: There was testimony given before the committee that when the Secretary determined the law the trade acquiesced in the justice of the decision; but a certain firm of lawyers went to the large importers and invited them to protest and appeal, saying that by and by they would get them their money provided the attorneys should have one-half; so that after a sufficient fund had accumulated they succeeded in inducing the Secretary to reverse his opinion, and the witness said he had received $25,000, and his counsel $25,000, and they still had other cases.

Now, sir, the whole trade were ready to acquiesce in that, and there lingers a suspicion, well founded on evidence, that your enrolled law was tampered with in the State Department, in order to enable that conspiracy of lawyers to secure a reversal of the opinion.

Now, in one case you have five authorized editions of the law, all taken from the statutes, and all standing in one way; and yet when you come to examine your official scroll you find the change of a comma is costing the Government $2,000,000, in contradiction to all the printed laws sent out for the government of the country.

This bill gives the privilege of appeal. It gives the Secretary of the Treasury the primary construction of the law, and it does but deny him the permission to reverse those decisions and distribute the money of the Treasury by millions of dollars. And I sincerely hope it will be passed.

Mr. COBURN. Before the gentleman concludes, I wish to ask him a question. He says that it enables the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of $2,000,000 annually.

Mr. KELLEY. A much larger sum than that.

Mr. COBURN. Does the gentleman mean to say that it was disposed of wrongfully?

Mr. KELLEY. I mean to say this, that when your law was construed it stood, as everybody connected with the law believed, to support the decision. But when millions are piled up, a comma is strangely converted into a semicolon, and upon the construction of the Secretary of the Treasury your millions go out.

Mr. COBURN. I did not know but the gentleman was speaking under a partial misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not spoken under any misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. COBURN. As to its being wrongfully distributed?

Mr. KELLEY. In my judgment, and that of the committee, it was wrongfully distributed, but we do not charge the Secretary with any wrong-doing.
